It was further added, That a Papist convict, as soon as he conforms himself, and receives the Sacrament, is immediately cleared; no incapacity lies upon him. But this act would carry the matter farther to a year's incapacity. A Papist, that shall relapse and fall under a second conviction, is still convicted over again, without any aggravation of the censure; which by this bill would be much heightened upon a second offence: So that the penalties of this bill are higher than any the law has laid on Papists for assisting at the solemnest act of their Religion. Before the act of Toleration passed, while Conventicles were illegal and criminal assemblies, a man in office, that was present at them, was only liable to a fine of 10*l*. Whereas by this bill he would be liable to a fine of an 100*l*, for being present at them; though they have an impunity by law: It does not seem so very suitable, that the same action should be made ten times more penal, after such an impunity is granted, than it was before the passing that law, while such assemblies were illegal. It seems insinuating, and unbecoming so mild a Government as ours, to lay so heavy a penalty on a crime so dubiously expressed: Nor is it proper, that the sums raised by the bill should all go to the Informer, which might give encouragement to false accusations and perjury. This occasional Conformity has been both the principle and practice of some of the most eminent among the Dissenters ever since St Bartholomew's in 1662. Nor is it a certain inference, that, because a man receives the Sacrament in the Church, he can therefore conform in every other particular. Occasional Conformity was a step that carried many much further: And it was intimated, that the Lords were not willing to ruin persons utterly on account of a practice, that many well-meaning men have been and may be led into, and which they think naturally tends to bring them over intirely to the Church, &c. &c.

The Managers, on the behalf of the Commons, replied, that several arguments, urged by the Managers 1702. place of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland (1). He was uneasy at the preference, which the Duke of Marlborough had in the Queen's confidence, and at the Lord Godolphin's being made Lord-Treasurer. It was generally believed, that he was endeavouring to embroil affairs, and laying a train of opposition in the House of Commons. The Queen sent a message to him, ordering him to make ready to go to Ireland; for it seemed very strange, especially in time of a war, that a person, in so great a post, should not attend upon it. But he, after some days advising about it, went to the Queen, and desired to be excused from that employment. This was readily accepted, and upon that he withdrew from the Councils; and his post of Lord-Lieutenant was (as hath been said) conferred on the Duke of Ormond.

Inquiry into the public accounts.
Pr. H. C. III. 247. Burnet.

The report of the Commissioners, appointed to take the public accounts, was a business that took up much time in this Session, and occasioned many debates. They pretended that they had made great discoveries. They began with the Earl of Ranelagh as Pay-master General of the Army, and drew up a narrative, wherein they charged him with great mismanagements. The Earl had been Pay-master of the Army in King James's time; and, being very fit for the post, he had been continued all the last Reign: He had lived high, and so it was believed, his appointments could not support so great an expence; He had an account of one and twenty millions lay upon him. It was given out, that a great deal of the money, lodged in his office, for the pay of the Army, was diverted to other uses, distributed among Favourites, or given to corrupt Members of Parliament; and that some millions had been sent over to Holland: It had been often said, that great discoveries would be made, whensoever his accounts were looked into: And that he, to save himself, would lay open the ill practices of the former Reign. But now, when all was brought under a strict examination, a few inconsiderable articles, of some hundreds of pounds, was all that could be found to be objected to him: And, even to these, he gave clear and full answers. At last they found, that, upon the breaking of a regiment, a sum, which he had issued out for its pay, had been returned to his office, the regiment being broke sooner, than that pay was exhausted: And that no entry of this was made in his accounts. To this he answered, that his Officer, who received the money, was, within three days after, taken so ill of a confirmed stone, that he never came again to the office, but died in great misery: And, during those three days, he had not entered that sum in the books. Lord Ranelagh acknowledged, that he was liable to account for all the money that was received by his Under-officers; but here was no crime or fraud designed; yet this was so aggravated, that he saw his good post was his greatest guilt: He therefore quitted his place, which being divided, Mr Howe was appointed Pay-master of the Guards and Garrisons at home, as being the more lasting post; and Sir Stephen Fox, Pay-master of the forces beyond sea. Upon this, all the clamour raised against the Earl of Ranelagh ceased; however, the Commons vindicated the report of the Commissioners by a vote, and, to make a show of severity, expelled the Earl the House, on the 7th of February, 'for a high crime and misdemeanour, in misapplying several sums of the public money.' But, upon all this canvassing, he appeared much more innocent than even his friends had believed him.

The clamour that had been long kept up against the former Ministry, as devourers of the public treasure, was of such use to the prevailing party, that they resolved to continue it, by all possible methods: So a Committee of the House of Commons prepared a long address to the Queen, reflecting on the ill management of the funds upon which they laid the great debt of the Nation, and not upon the deficiencies. This was branched out into many particulars, which were all heavily aggravated. Yet, though a great part of the outcry had been formerly made against Russell, Treasurer of the Navy, and his office, they found not so much as a colour to fix a complaint there: Nor could they charge any thing on the Chancery, the Treasury, and the Administration of Justice. Great complaints were made of some accounts that stood long out, and they insisted on some pretended neglects, the old methods of the Exchequer not having been exactly followed: Though it did not appear that the public suffered in any sort by these failures. They kept up a clamour likewise against the Commissioners of the Prizes, though they had paid their accounts as the law directed, and no objection was made to them. The address

'nagers for the Lords, were against the bill, which they had seemed to agree to. That no time could be more seasonable for this bill than the present, because good laws may be obtained most easily in the best Reigns. That, should any by this bill be turned out of their employments, and consequently lose their votes in elections, yet it cannot be said they lose their birth-rights, because no man is born a Magistrate. That some of the Lords arguments had been so irregular as to defend occasional Conformity. And that they were surprized to hear a Prelate speak in defence of such a practice.'

(1) The Duchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 142, tells us, that this Earl was the first of the Tory leaders, who discovered a deep discontent with the Queen and the Administration; and resigned the Lieutenantancy of Ireland in great wrath, upon her Majesty's being so unreasonable, as to press him to go thither to attend the affairs of that Kingdom, which greatly needed his presence. For, as the revenue, which had been formerly granted, was out, it was necessary to call a Parliament, in order to another supply; and a Parliament could not be held without a Lord-Lieutenant. But, when the Queen represented these things to him, he told her, with great insolence, 'That he would not go to Ireland, though he would give the Country to him and his son; so that he seemed to have accepted the post, only that he might reign in Ireland by the Ministry of his brother Keightley, as he hoped to do in England in person. Nor could he, after his resignation, overcome his anger so far, as to wait upon the Queen, or go to Council; which the observing, ordered, after sometime, that he should no more be summoned, saying, 'That it was not reasonable he should come to Council only when he pleased.' It was generally thought, and with good reason, that the true source of his dissatisfaction was the Queen's not making him her sole Governor and Director, and Lord Godolphin's being preferred before him for the Treasury.

(1) These

1702. drefs was full of fevere reflections and fpiteful infinuations, and it was thus carried to the Queen, and published to the Nation, as the fenfe of the Commons of England.

The Lords, to prevent the ill impreffions this might make, appointed a Committee, to examine all the obfervations that the Commiffioners of accounts had offered to both Houfes. They fearch'd all the public offices, and were amazed to find, that there was not one article of any importance, in thofe obfervations, or in all the Commons addrefs to the queen, but what was falfe in fact. They found, that the deficiencies in the former Reign were of two forts: The one was of fums, that the Commons had voted, but for which they had made no fort of provision: The other was, where the fupply, that was given, fell fhort of the fum, at which it was eftimated; and between thefe two the deficiencies amounted to fourteen millions. This was the root of all the great debt, that lay on the Nation. They examined into all the pretended mifmanagement, and found, that what the Commons had ftated fo invidioufly was miftaken; fince King William and his Minifters had been fo far from mifapplying the money, that was given for public occafions, that the King had applied three millions to the public fervice, which by law was his own money, of which they made up the account. They found alfo, that fome fmall omiffions, in fome of the forms of the Exchequer, were of no confequence, and neither had nor could have any ill effect: And, whereas a vaft clamour was raifed againft paffing accounts by Privy-Seals, they put an end to that effectually, when it appeared on what ground this was done. By the ancient methods of the Exchequer, every account was to be carried on, fo that the new officer was to begin his account with the balance of the former account. Sir Edward Seymour, who had been Treafurer of the Navy, owed by his laft account an hundred and eighty thoufand pounds; and he had received, after that, an hundred and forty thoufand pounds, for which the accounts were never made up. As it was not poffible therefore for thofe, who came after him, to be liable for his accounts, the Treafury of the Navy, in the laft Reign, were obliged to take out Privy-Seals for making up their accounts. Thefe imported no more, than that they were to account only for the money, which they themfelves had received; for, in all other refpects, their accounts were to pafs according to the ordinary methods of the Exchequer. Complaints had alfo been made of the remiffnefs of the Lords of the Treafury, or their Officers, appointed to account with the Receivers of Counties for the aids, that had been given. But when this was examined, it appeared, that this had been done with fuch exactnefs, that, of the fum of twenty-four millions, for which they had accounted, there was not owing above fixty thoufand pounds, and that was, for the moft part, in Wales, where it was not thought advifable to ufe too much rigour in raifing it; and of that fum, there was not above fourteen thoufand pounds, that was reckoned as loft. The Collectors of the Customs likewife answered all the obfervations made on their accounts fo fully, that the Houfe of Commons was fatisfied with their answers, and difmiffed them without fo much as a reprimand. All this was reported to the Houfe of Lords, and they laid it before the Queen in an addrefs, which was afterwards printed with the vouchers to every particular. By this means it was made out, to the fatisfaction of the whole Nation, how falfe thofe reports were, which had been fo induftrioufly spread, and were fo eafily believed by the greater part; for the bulk of mankind will be always apt to think, that Courts and Minifters ferve their own ends, and ftudy to enrich themfelves at the public coft. The examination held long, and was profecuted with great exactnefs, and had all the effects, that could be defired from it; for it filenced that noife, which King William's enemies had raifed, to afperfe him and his Minifters (1). With this the Seflion ended, and the Queen,

(1) Thofe readers, who defire a fuller account of thefe matters, will find it in the following extract:
On the 18th of January, Mr St John, from the Commiffioners of the public accounts, prefented to the Houfe of Commons a general ftate of receipts and iffues of the public revenue, between the feaft of St Michael, 1700, 1701, and 1702, with obfervations thereupon. This having been taken into confideration the following days, and, Mr Bridges, one of the Commiffioners, having, on the 25th prefented to the Houfe an account of both the loans and payments on the votes of that Houfe, in February 1700, and of the produce of twenty-five per cent. on French goods, and the application of the fame, it was then refolved, "That the borrowing of money, and ftriking tallies with intereft unnecessary, before the publick occafions required the fame, had been one reafon of the great debt, which lay upon the Nation: And that the applying of the public money to the ufe of the civil lift, which was otherwife provided for, was another caufe of that great debt." The next day, Colonel Birley, from the Commiffioners, prefented to the Houfe their report, purfuant to an order of the Houfe, by which they were directed to examine the Auditor and other Officers of the Exchequer, relating to the paffing of the accounts of the public money, and to lay before the Houfe what they fhould find to be the caufe, that the accounts were not annually and duly paffed, according to the laws in that cafe, and through whole default it had happened. This report, and feveral paragraphs of the Commiffioners obfervations, being read, the Houfe refolved, "1. That Charles Lord Halifax, Auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, had neglected his duty, and was guilty of a breach of truft, in not transmitting the impreft-rolls half-yearly to the King's Remembrancer, according to the act made in the Seflion of Parliament, held in the 8th and 9th years of his late Majefty's Reign, intituled, An act for the better obfervation of the courfe anciently ufed in the receipt of Exchequer. 2. That the allowing Accountants the charges of law-fuits, to determine the right of their Officers, was a mifapplication of the public money. 3. That the Auditors of the Imprefst had been guilty of a great neglect of their duty, in not certifying to the King's Remembrancer the neglect of the feveral annual accounts, that the procefs might go out againft them. And, 4. That there had been a general mifmanagement of the public money, by not obliging Accountants to make up their accounts, and by continuing Receivers in feveral Counties, contrary to law, who had neglected to make up their accounts in due time, which had been a great abufe of the public, and another caufe of the great debt that lay upon the Nation." On the 27th, the Commons, having proceeded in the further confideration of the obfervation of the Commiffioners of public accounts, refolved, 1. "That the money, impreft out of the Exchequer for the fer-on the 27th of February, after having given the Royal assent to all the bills that were ready, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Return you my hearty thanks for the great dispatch you have given to the public affairs in this Session, which is an advantage extremely material at all times, and I hope we shall find the fruits of it this year, in the forwardness of our preparations.

"I am to thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, in particular, for the supplies, with which you enable me to carry on the war. It shall be my care to have them strictly applied to the uses, for which you have designed them, and to the best advantage for the public service. You have reposed great confidence in me, by allowing so unusual a latitude, as you have in the clause of Appropriations. I shall improve all opportunities in the use of it, for the honour and true interest of the Nation.

"I must further take notice to you, that the readiness you have shewn, in the provision made for the Prince, is a very sensible obligation to me.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I desire and expect from you, that you make it your business in your several Coun"tries to continue and preserve the quiet and satisfaction of my subjects. I hope such of them, as have the misfortune to dissent from the Church of England, will rest secure and satisfied in the act of Toleration, which I am resolved to maintain; and that all those, who have the happiness and advantage to be of the Church of England, will consider, that I have had my education in it, and that I have been willing to run great hazards for its preservation; and therefore they may be very sure, I shall always make it my own particular care to encourage and maintain this Church, as by law established, and every the least Member of it, in all their just rights and privileges; and, upon all occasions of promotions to any Ecclesiastical Dignity, I shall have a very just regard to such, as are eminent and remarkable for their piety, learning, and constant zeal for the Church; that by this, and all other methods, which shall be thought proper, I may transmit it securely settled to posterity.

"I think it might have been for the public service to have had some further laws for restraining the great licence, which is assumed, of publishing and spreading scandalous pamphlets and libels: But, as far as the present laws will extend, I hope you will all do your duty in your respective stations to prevent and punish such pernicious practices. Above all other things, I do recommend to you Peace and Union among ourselves, as the "most

"vice of the public, ought to be kept by the respective Officers in their own custody, until the same shall be paid to the uses, for which it was directed. 2. That Charles Lord Halifax, Auditor of the Receipt of the Exchequer, had been guilty of a breach of trust, in not examining every three months the Tellers Vouchers for the payments upon the annuities, which he allowed in his weekly certificates, according to the forementioned act of Parliament. 3. That the resolutions relating to the Lord Halifax be laid before her Majesty. And 4. That an address be presented to her Majesty, that she would be pleased to give directions to the Attorney-General to prosecute him for the said offences." On the 7th of February, Colonel Granville acquainted the House, that the Queen had been pleased to say, "That she would send to the Attorney-General, and give him her directions pursuant to this address."

On the other hand, the Lords, before whom Mr Gregory King, Secretary to the Commissioners of Accounts, had, on the 15th of January, laid an account of the general state of the receipts and issues of the public revenue, from the feast of St Michael 1700, to the same feast in 1702, with their observations thereupon, ordered, on the 1st of February, that the Commissioners of accounts should lay before their Lordships what further observations they had made in relation to the said accounts. The next day the Lords took the book of public accounts into consideration, and read the first paragraph of the Commissioners observations; which, relating to the Lord Halifax, his Lordship was heard thereto. Then Mr King delivered at the bar the Commissioners of accounts farther observations; and at the same time the Queen's Remembrancer laid before their Lordships the imprest-rolls transmitted to him since November 1699. This being done, a Committee was appointed to consider of the observations delivered first to their Lordships from the Commissioners of accounts; and it was ordered, "That the Queen's Remembrancer should, the next day, bring before the said Committee the imprest-rolls transmitted to him since the 20th of April

1697, being the time, from which the act commenced: And, secondly, That the Commissioners for public accounts should have notice, that their Lordships had appointed a Committee to consider of their observations." On the 3d of February, Mr Barker, Deputy to her Majesty's Remembrancer, brought the other imprest-rolls, as ordered the day before; which were delivered to the Committee, and the Duke of Somerset reported from the said Committee, that they had taken the first observation into consideration, in relation to the Auditor of the Exchequer: That, though the Commissioners of accounts had notice of the Committee's sitting, yet none of them attended; and therefore the Committee was of opinion, that a message be sent to the House of Commons, that they might have leave to attend; which message was, on the 4th of February, sent accordingly. On the 5th, the Commons, having taken the said message into consideration, appointed a Committee to inspect the journals, and to search precedents relating to what had been done upon the Lords desiring Members of the House of Commons to attend the House of Lords, and in relation to the Lords inspecting and examining accounts. And the same day the Duke of Somerset made the following report: "The Committee, appointed to consider of the observations in the book of accounts delivered into this House, have made some progress in considering the said observations, and take leave to acquaint this House, that they have examined into the first of these observations; and also the further observations delivered into this House, the 2d instant, relating to the transmitting the ordinary imprest-rolls to the Queen's Remembrancer. They have inspected several of the original imprest-rolls delivered into the House by Mr Barker, Deputy to her Majesty's Remembrancer. They also examined divers Officers of the Exchequer, and others, upon oath, and do find, that, by the ancient and uninterrupted course of the Exchequer, two imprest-rolls are to be made out for each year; the one comprehending all such sums imprest from the end of Trinity-Term to the 1702. "most effectual means, that can be devised to discourage and defeat the designs of our enemies.

 "I must not conclude without acquainting you, I have given directions, that my part of all the prizes, which have been or shall be taken during this war, be applied intirely to the public service; and I hope my own revenue will not fall so short, but that I may be able, as I desire, to contribute yet further to the ease of my people."
 After which the Lord-Keeper, by her Majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament to Thursday the 22d of April following.

Several bills moved this Session (some of which passed the Commons) but were not finished. On the 23d of December, Sir Edward Seymour moved for leave to bring in a bill "to resume all the grants made in King William's Reign, and applying them to the use of the public." This was carried by a majority of one hundred and eighty against seventy-eight, though the bill was afterwards dropped by the Commons themselves. At the same time it was moved by Mr Walpole, "that all the grants, made in the Reign of the late King James, should also be resumed." But this by the same Commons was passed in the negative. Sir John Holland then made a motion to bring in a bill "for the more free and impartial proceedings in Parliament, by providing, That no person whatsoever in office or employment should be capable of sitting in Parliament," which also passed in the negative. Howe, Mufgrave, Seymour, &c. who had so vehemently pushed the like bill in King William's Reign, were now as warm in opposing this,

"end of Hilary-Term; the other containing all such sums from that time to the end of Trinity-Term; which rolls are commonly called half-yearly-rolls, though improperly. They find, that, by the ancient course of the Exchequer, these imprest-rolls, being made out by the Auditor of the receipt, are to be delivered by him to the Clerk of the Pells, whose duty it is to examine and sign them; and, this being done, the Clerk of the Pells delivers them to the Remembrancer. This usage was by degrees discontinued in the Reign of King Charles the Second; and the Remembrancer, or his Agent, used to come to the office of the Auditor of the receipt, and take away the imprest-rolls from thence immediately. But in the time, when the Earl of Rochester was Treasurer, the ancient usage was restored, and he did order, that the imprest-rolls should be carefully examined and signed by the Clerk of the Pells, before they should be transmitted to the Remembrancer; and accordingly, since that time, the ancient custom has been observed, as well before as since the act of Parliament made in the 8th and 9th years of his late Majesty, for the better observation of the course anciently used in the receipt of the Exchequer; that is to say, the said half-yearly rolls, when made out, and signed by the Auditor, have been by him transmitted to the Clerk of the Pells; and when the Clerk of the Pells has examined and signed them, he, or his Deputy, has delivered them to the Remembrancer; and this appears by the Remembrancer's indorsement upon the rolls. The Committee finds, that Charles Lord Halifax has been Auditor of the receipt from the end of November 1699, since which time six imprest-rolls have been transmitted to the Remembrancer; and there is a seventh roll now under examination of the office of the Pells, and no other roll can be prepared till after the 12th of this instant February. Upon the whole matter, the Committee are humbly of opinion, that Charles Lord Halifax, Auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, hath performed the duty of his office, in transmitting the ordinary imprest-rolls to the Queen's Remembrancer, according to the ancient custom of the Exchequer, and the directions of the act of the 8th and 9th Gulielm. III. and that he hath not been guilty of any neglect or breach of trust upon that account."

"the Queen's Remembrancer, according to the ancient custom of the Exchequer, and the direction of the act 8^o & 9^o Gulielmi III. Regis, intitled, An act for the better observation of the course anciently used in the receipt of the Exchequer; and that he hath not been guilty of any neglect or breach of trust upon that account." At the same time the Lords ordered their proceedings in this affair to be immediately printed and published.

This vindication of the Lord Halifax gave great offence to the House of Commons, who, on the 12th of February, ordered their Committee to search the journals of the House of Lords, and report their Lordships proceedings in relation to the observations of the Commissioners of accounts. Pursuant to this order, Colonel Granville the next day reported to the House what the Committee had found both in the Lords journals relating to this affair, and in the journals of the House of Commons relating to what had been done upon the Lords desiring Members of the said House to attend the House of Lords; and in relation to the Lords inspecting and examining public accounts. This report being read, the Commons ordered the same Committee to draw up what was proper to be offered to the Lords at a Conference upon the subject-matter of their Lordships message of the 4th instant, which the committee did accordingly in this manner: "The Commons cannot comply with your Lordships desires contained in your message of the 4th instant, because the Commons are full of the same opinion, as was delivered to your Lordships in February 1691, at a free Conference upon the subject-matter of the amendments made by the Lords to the additional bill, for the appointing and enabling Commissioners to examine, take, and state the public accounts of the Kingdom, when they desired to know the end your Lordships would propose to yourselves by an enquiry into the public accounts. For, should any misapplication of money, or default of distribution, appear in the accounts, your Lordships cannot take cognizance thereof originally, or otherwise, even in your judicial capacity, than at the complaint of the Commons. And, should a failure or want of money appear, it is not in your Lordships power to redress it, for the grant of all aids is in the Commons only; or, if there be any surplussage, the Commons only can apply it to the charge of the ensuing year. But, should the Commons give leave to the Commissioners to attend your Lordships, no information, they can give against any person whatsoever, can intitle your Lordships either to acquit or condemn. Yet, since this message, the Commons find in your Lordships journals a resolution, declaring, That Charles Lord Halifax, Auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, has performed the duty of his office, &c. which looks to the Commons, as if your Lordships pretended to give a judgment of acquittal, without any accusation brought

This report being read, as also the examination taken upon oath by the Committee, and the dates and indorsements of the several imprest-rolls delivered by Mr Barker, the question was put, "Whether this House would agree to the opinion of the Committee in this report?" Which being carried in the affirmative, it was resolved and declared by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That Charles Lord Halifax, Auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, hath performed the duty of his office, in transmitting the ordinary imprest-rolls to 1702. this, and instead of it carried a bill "for the more free and impartial proceedings in Parliament, by providing, that no person shall be chosen a Member, but such as have a sufficient real estate." This bill was rejected by the Lords, on the 22d of February.

Some new Peers
made.
Baronet.
Conduct of the Duchess
of Marl.

In this Session the Lords had rendered themselves very considerable, and had gained an universal reputation over the Nation. It is true, those who had opposed the persons, that had carried matters before them in this Session, were so near them in number, that things of the greatest consequence were carried only by one or two voices; and therefore, as it was intended to have a clear majority in both Houses in the next Session, the Queen was prevailed with, soon after the prorogation, to create four new Peers, who had been the most violent of the whole party. Accordingly John Granville was made Baron Granville of Potteridge in the County of Devon; Henage Finch, Baron of Guernsey in the County of Southampton; Sir John Levison Gower, Baron Gower of Sittenham in the County of York; and Francis Seymour Conway, youngest son of Sir Edward Seymour, Baron Conway of Ragley in the County of Warwick, with a remainder to his brother Charles Seymour. Great reflections were made upon these promotions. When some severe things had been thrown out in the House of Commons upon the opposition, that they met with from the Lords, it was insinuated, that it would be easy to find men of merit and estate to make a clear majority in that House. This was an open declaration of a design to put every thing into the hands and power of that party. It was also an encroachment on one of the tenderest points of the prerogative, to make motions of creating Peers

"brought before your Lordships, and consequently without any trial. And that, which makes your Lordships proceeding yet more irregular, it tends to prejudging a cause which might regularly have come before you, either originally by impeachment, or by writ of error from the courts below. And therefore the Commons can see no use of their resolution, unless it be either to intimidate the Judges, or prepossess a Jury. But, if your Lordships could have judged in this matter, it does not appear by your Lordships journals, that you have had under your examination the respective times of transmitting the several imprest-rolls to the Queen's Remembrancer; without which it is impossible to know, whether the Auditor of the receipt has done his duty according to the late act of Parliament." These reasons being reported, on the 16th of February, by Colonel Granville, and afterwards read and approved by the House, a message was immediately sent to the Lords, to desire a Conference; to which the Lords having the next day agreed, the Managers for the Commons delivered the said reasons to their Lordships. The Lords upon this, on the 18th, came to the following resolutions: First, "That the Lords have an undoubted right (which they can never suffer to be contested) to take cognizance originally of all public accounts, and to inquire into any misapplication or default in the distribution of public monies, or into any other mismanagement whatsoever. Secondly, That the Lords, in their inquiry into, and examination of the observations of the Commissioners of accounts, in relation to Charles Lord Halifax, and in their resolution thereupon, had proceeded according to the rules of justice, and the evidence, that was before them. And, thirdly, That the Commons, in their reasons delivered at the last Conference, had used several expressions and arguments highly reflecting, and altogether unparliamentary, tending to destroy all good correspondence between the two Houses, and to the subversion of the Constitution."

The Queen, being apprehensive of the consequences of these differences between the two Houses, sent a message to the Lords, on the 22d of February, by the Earl of Nottingham, to make a quick dispatch with the business before them; and the same day their Lordships communicated the abovementioned resolution to the Commons at a Conference, which their Lordships had desired and appointed. The Commons, having the next day taken the same into consideration, resolved, That a free Conference be desired with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the two last Conferences; and ordered their Managers to consider of what heads were fit to be urged at the said free Conference, which they accordingly did, and the said heads were as follow: 1. "That no cognizance, the Lords can take of the public accounts, can enable them to supply any deficiency, or apply any surplusage of the public money. 2. That the Lords can neither acquit or condemn any person whatsoever, upon any inquiry arising originally in their own House. 3. That the attempt the Lords have made, to acquit Charles Lord Halifax, Auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, is unparliamentary, and not warranted by any precedent: And the resolution thereupon plainly contrary to what appears on the records themselves. 4. That the Conference, desired by the Commons, was in order to preserve a good correspondence between both Houses, by offering reasons to prevent the Lords from proceeding in a case, which they had no precedent to warrant; and the Commons expressing the consequences they apprehend might follow from that resolution, was neither reflecting, nor unparliamentary, nor tending to destroy the good correspondence between the two Houses; and much less to the subversion of the Constitution: And, 5. That the Lords delivering at a Conference their resolutions, instead of reasons, in answer to the reasons of the Commons, is not agreeable to the ancient rules and methods of Parliament observed in the conferences between the two Houses." These heads being reported by Colonel Granville on the 25th, and then read, and approved by the House, a message was sent to the Lords, to desire a free Conference with their Lordships, who appointed the same immediately in the Painted Chamber, and named the Lord Steward, the Earl of Carlisle, and the Lords Herbert, Halifax, and Ferrers, to be their Managers.

The Managers for the Commons, at the head of whom was Mr Finch, opened the particulars, which they had in direction to insist on; adding, "That, when they acquainted their Lordships that the expressing the consequences, which they apprehended might follow from their Lordships resolutions, it was not a charge upon their Lordships, that they intended that consequence, but they would have been very glad their Lordships would have been pleased to have let them know, what use was to be made of it, or what they intended by it." And concluded, "That, if their Lordships did controvert any of these points, they were ready to maintain them." The Lords made no answer to any of these particulars, except to the matter of the resolution relating to the Lord Halifax, upon which they acknowledged, "That they were no Court of inquiry to form any accusation: That their proceeding in relation to that Lord was no trial, nor was their resolution any judgment or acquittal; but that he might still be prosecuted as before. But that, which gave occasion to that proceeding, was the resolution of the House of Commons, which they found in the printed Votes, reflecting upon a member of their House; and thereupon they thought fit to give their opinion, which they did in their legislative authority."

The Managers for the Commons replied, "That their

However, at the same time, John Harvey, who was of the opposite party, was created Baron of Ickworth in the County of Suffolk, by the interest of the Duchess of Marlborough with the Queen (1). The Marquis of Normanby was created Duke of the same name, to which the title of Duke of Buckinghamshire was afterwards added (2).

tion.
Burnet.

After the proceedings in the Parliament, those of the Convocation, which was called with the Parliament, are next to be related. Dr Aldrich, Dean of Christ-Church, was chosen Prolocutor. At the first opening, there was a contest between the two Houses, that lasted some days, concerning an address to the Queen. The Lower House intended to cast some reflections on the late Reign, in imitation of what the House of Commons had done, and these reflections

“ their Lordships having in their resolutions declared, “ that they had proceeded according to the rules of “ justice, and the evidence, that was before them, “ the Commons could put no other interpretation upon it, than that it was intended as a judgment: And “ no judgment could be made, where there was no “ accusation; and, if it was not a judgment, they “ could not imagine what it did tend to. As to their “ Lordships delivering their opinion, that it was against “ the rules of any Court, that any Judge whatsoever “ should deliver his opinion in a cause, that might “ come before him; and that this matter might here- “ after come judicially before their Lordships. That “ there was a great difference between the Vote of “ the Commons and the Resolution of the Lords. “ That the vote of the House of Commons was but “ in order to a prosecution, which they can never vote “ without declaring the crime, and they can never “ come to be judges of it. That the House of Com- “ mons is the Grand Inquest of the Nation, and every “ Grand-jury, that finds hilla vere upon an indictment, “ does by that declare the man guilty. But that the “ Lords have a judicial capacity, and their resolution, “ before an accusation brought, is prejudging the “ cause, that may come regularly before them. As to “ the observation the Commons made, that the Lords “ had not examined the respective times of transmit- “ ting the imprest-rolls to the Queen’s Remembrancer, “ the Commons Managers said, That, as their Lord- “ ships resolution was no judgment, so this conference “ was no trial. But, to shew the mistake of their Lord- “ ships resolution, they observed, that upon the several “ imprest-rolls, that had been transmitted to the Re- “ membrancer; and that they apprehend there were “ still two wanting: That the three last, that were “ transmitted, came not to the Remembrancer till “ January last; the two first on the 23d, the last on “ the 27th; and that the first of these three imprest- “ rolls was money imprest to the 21st of February 1700, “ and said to be in the first year of Queen Anne; which “ shewed, that the Roll was so far from being ex- “ amined or transmitted in time, that it was not made “ up till since her Majesty came to the Crown. That, “ as the custom formerly had been to set down the “ time of the examination of those Rolls, since Mr “ Charles Montague came in to be Auditor, he set “ down the month, but not the day: And, since the “ Lord Hallifax was Auditor, he had set down neither “ month nor day; and that by his example, on the “ three last interest-rolls, the Clerk of the Pells had “ put no time at all.”

To this the Lord Hallifax, in his own defence, replied, “ That the Lords resolution was well founded, “ since they had the Rolls themselves before them, and “ proof upon oath. That, by the words of the act, “ the Auditor was to transmit the Imprest-Rolls to the “ Remembrancer half-yearly, according to the usual “ course of the Exchequer; which is eight months and “ four months. That it was not his duty to transmit “ them immediately to the Remembrancer, because “ he was to send them to the Clerk of the Pells, who “ is to examine and sign them. That it could not be “ imagined, that the Auditor should be tied to a cer- “ tain time to transmit the Rolls to the Remembran- “ cer, because they must first go through another “ hand; and he never took it, there was any occasion “ to put down the time he examined them, for that “ would appear from the time of the delivery and date “ of the Roll. That there was one examined by the “ No. 38. Vol. III.

“ Clerk of the Rolls, the 4th of July, which he did “ not take to be the Auditor’s fault, but to be the “ duty of the Clerk of the Pells to deliver them. “ That every body knew the great trouble, that had “ been given in his, as well as other Offices, by the “ Commissioners of Accounts; and that no loss had “ happened by not transmitting these Rolls, no process “ having been issued forth for many years upon them.” The Managers for the Commons, said, “ That, tho’ “ half-yearly should be taken for eight months and four “ months, yet by that they must be transmitted twice “ a year; and so he had failed in his duty in that re- “ spect. That to contravene the ancient course of the “ Exchequer in the act of Parliament, to be meant, “ that the Clerk of the Pells should transmit the “ Rolls, was a direct contradiction to the act, that “ says, the Auditor shall do it. That the ancient course “ of the Exchequer having not been observed, was the “ occasion of making that law; and that they thought “ laws were to be observed. That indeed no process “ could issue till the Rolls were transmitted, and pos- “ sibly might be the ground the accounts had been so “ long unpassed, to the prejudice of the public. And “ that, in his Lordship’s apprehension, there was no loss “ to the public by not transmitting the Rolls, might “ probably be the reason of his Lordship’s neglecting “ his duty.”

Here the free Conference broke up; and, the Mem- “ bers being returned to their respective Houses, the Com- “ mons ordered their Managers to draw up a report of “ the said free Conference; and then a motion was “ made, “ That the votes of the House should not be “ printed; and that this might be a standing order;” which was carried in the affirmative. The Lords, on “ the contrary, ordered their proceedings, in relation “ to the public accounts, to be immediately printed; where- “ upon the Commons resolved to publish their proceed- “ ings likewise.

(1) The Duchess observes, in the Account of her Cam- “ paign, p. 127, that she obtained the Peerage for him, “ in spite of the opposition of the Tories, and especially “ of the other four new Peers, who, for a while, refused “ the Peerage, if Mr Harvey, a Whig, were admitted “ to the same honour. The Duchess brings this as an “ instance of her differing from the Queen in her notions “ about the Tories, to which she adds a letter from the “ Queen, to the same purpose.

“ I am very glad to find by my dear Mrs Fre- “ man’s, that I was blessed with yesterday, that she “ liked my speech, but I cannot help being ex- “ tremely concerned, you are so partial to the “ Whigs, because I would not have you, and your “ poor, unfortunate, faithful Morley differ in opi- “ nion in the least thing. What I said, when I writ “ last upon this subject, does not proceed from any “ insinuations of the other party; but I know the “ principles of the Church of England, and I know those “ of the Whigs, and that it is that, and no other reason, “ which makes me think as I do, of the last. And “ upon my word, my dear Mrs Freeman, you are “ mightily mistaken in your notion of a true Whig: “ For the character, you give of them, does not in “ the least belong to them, but to the Church. But “ I will say no more on this subject, only beg, for “ my poor sake, that you would not shew more coun- “ tenance to those, you seem to have so much incli- “ nation for, than to the Church party.”

(2) Other promotions were: The Marquis of Caer- “ marthen was made Vice-Admiral of the Red; Gray- “ don,

1702. reflections were so worded, as most of the Bishops were pointed at by them; but, the Upper House refusing to concur, the Lower House receded; and both agreed at last in another address, which was presented to the Queen, and in which they expressed their "great sense of the favour and goodness of God, in setting her Majesty on the Throne of her Ancestors, and making her the Defender of that faith, of which she had been so glorious an ornament. They thanked her Majesty for her many gracious assurances of her unmoveable resolution to support and protect the Church of England, as by law established, and to continue it to future ages, by maintaining the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line." And told her Majesty, "That they promised themselves, that, whatever might be wanting to restore the Church to its due rights and privileges, her Majesty would have the glory of doing it, and of securing it to posterity." She told them in answer, "That their concurrence, in this dutiful address, was a good preface of their Union in all other matters, which was very desirable for her service, and the good of the Church." But they did not answer her Majesty's expectations. The former contest was soon revived. Many days were not passed, before the Lower House applied to the Archbishop of Canterbury and his Suffragans, begging, that the matters in dispute, about which there had been differences in two late Convocations, concerning the manner of Synodical proceedings, and the right of the Lower House to hold intermediate assemblies, might be taken into consideration, and speedily determined, that so business might not be hindered, nor the order and peace of the Church disturbed.

Nov. 13. The Bishops resolved to offer them all that they could without giving up their character and authority. They proposed, that, in the intervals of Sessions, the Lower House might appoint Committees to prepare matters, and, when business was brought regularly before them, the Archbishop would so order the prorogations, that they might have sufficient time to sit and deliberate about it. This fully satisfied many of that body: But the majority still insisted on the right to hold assemblies, and continue to act as an House in the intervals of prorogations, and therefore renewed their request, that something might be offered more effectual to the purpose intended.

Nov. 18. On that day it was ordered by the House of Commons, that Mr Lloyd (son of the Bishop of Worcester) should be prosecuted by the Attorney-General, after his privilege as a Member of the Lower House of Convocation was out. This being taken notice of by the said Lower House of Convocation, they, on the 20th of November, ordered, that their Prolocutor, and three of their Members, should wait on Mr Speaker of the Honourable House of Commons, to return their humble thanks to him, and to that most Honourable House, for the great favour which they had on all occasions been pleased to express: And particularly for the late regard which they of themselves, without suggestion or sollicitation, were pleased to have to the privileges of their House, in the case of one of their Members, who had the misfortune to fall under their displeasure. This was read to Mr Speaker at his House, November 21, and the same day he read it in the House of Commons; who thereupon passed a vote, by which it was resolved, That the House would on all occasions assert the just rights and privileges of the Lower House of Convocation. Which made some conclude, that now they should certainly carry their point. But the Archbishops and Bishops, resolving to stand their ground, the very next day, November 22, made answer to the Lower House, that they thought they had offered what was sufficient towards the ending the differences there had been between them. That they could not depart from the Archbishop's right of proroguing the whole Convocation, with consent of his Suffragans, according to constant usage. That, by the same act, by which the Convocation is prorogued, the whole business of the Convocation is continued in the state it is then in, to that farther day of the next Session. That they could not admit of their new claim; and that what had been offered, was sufficient for the doing of any business to be done in Convocation.

Upon this the Lower House, representing it Dec. 2: as not so reasonable, that either House should be judge over the other in its own cause, proposed to refer the controversy to the Queen's decision, and to such as she should appoint to hear and settle it.

The Bishops answered, that they did not admire their affecting to express themselves in a manner, that sets the two Houses on such an equality, as was inconsistent with the Episcopal authority and the Archbishop's presidency. That they reckoned themselves safe and happy in the Queen's protection, and would pay all due submission to her orders; but could not think it proper to trouble her with the controversy: And that it was not in their power to part with any of those rights vested in them by the Constitution of the Church, and the Laws and Customs of the Realm. Indeed it would have been a strange sight, very acceptable to the enemies of the Church, chiefly to Papists, to see the two Houses of Convocation pleading their authority and rights before a Committee don, Vice-Admiral of the White; Leake, Vice-Admiral of the Blue; Byng, Rear-Admiral of the Red; Dilks, Rear-Admiral of the White; and Beaumont, Rear-Admiral of the Blue. On the 13th of March, three Knights of the Garter were installed in St George's Chapel at Windsor. The Elector of Hanover, by his Proxy the Lord Mshun; the Duke of Bedford, in person; and the Duke of Marlborough, by his Proxy Sir Benjamin Bathurst. Two days after, the Queen appointed the Earl of Denbigh to be Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Leicester; the Lord Guildford, of Essex; and the Earl of Dysart, of Suffolk. On the 20th of the same month, the Archbishop of York, the Earl of Thanet, and the Lord Guernsey, were admitted into the Privy-Council. The next day Jerome Pierrepont was created Baron Pierrepont of Ardglass in Ireland; and, on the 24th, the Earl of Rutland was made Marquis of Granby, and Duke of Rutland; and Edward Harley was, by the interest of his brother, the Speaker, appointed Auditor of the Impress, in the room of Thomas Done deceased.

1702. of Council, that was to determine the matter. The Lower House, perceiving that, by opposing their Bishops in so harsh as well as unheard-of a manner, they were represented as favourers of Presbytery; to clear themselves of that imputation, addressed the Upper House the same day, signifying their concern to find themselves aspersed as ill-affected to the Metropolitcal and Episcopal rights: and therefore they thought themselves obliged to make and sign the declaration annexed, praying their Lordships not to credit any such evil suggestions, and to cause their declaration to be entered in their books.

The substance of their declaration was, "Whereas they had been scandalously and maliciously represented as favourers of Presbytery, in opposition to Episcopacy, they now declared, That they acknowledged the order of Bishops as superior to Presbyters, to be of divine Apostolical institution, and that they claimed no rights, but what they conceived necessary to the very being of the Lower House of Convocation."

The party, that voted together and kept their intermediate Sessions, signed this declaration; and, in an additional address of the same day, desired the Bishops to concur in settling the doctrine of the Divine Apostolical right of Episcopacy, that it might be the standing rule of the Church. This was a plain attempt to make a Canon or Constitution, without obtaining a Royal licence, which by the statute, confirming the submission of the Clergy in Henry VIII's time, made both them and all who chose them incur a Praemunire. For this reason, many of the Lower House, in a separate address to the Archbishop, disclaimed the Declaration as apprehensive of the danger of such a proceeding, though they did not object against the truth of their doctrine, praying, that their dissent might be entered in their books.

Whilst the Bishops were considering of an answer to the address and declaration, the Lower House presented a petition to the Queen, shewing, that, after ten years interruption of holding Convocations, several questions arose in that in 1700, concerning the rights and liberties of the Lower House, and particularly about prorogations and adjournments. That, the Upper House had refused a verbal conference. That, in the next Convocation, the same question took place, and that it was expected they should absolutely submit to their Lordships judgment, though in their own cause. That in this Convocation, they had applied to their Lordships to suggest a method to settle the matter: But, not succeeding, had offered to submit it to her Majesty's determination, which their Lordships also declined. They therefore fled for protection and relief to her Majesty, begging she would call the question into her own Royal audience, &c. The Queen promised to consider their petition, and send them an answer as soon as she could. By this means the matter was brought into the hands of the Ministry; the Earl of Nottingham was of their side, but confessed, he understood not the Controversy. The Judges and the Queen's Council were ordered to examine, how the matter stood in point of law, which was thus fixed to them: The constant practice, as far as there were books or records, was, that the Archbishop prorogued the Convocation by a sebedule; of this the form was so fixed, that it could not be altered but by act of Parliament: There was a clause in the sebedule, that continued all matters before the Convocation, in the state in which they were, to the day to which he prorogued them: Hence it was evident, that there could be no intermediate Session, for a Session of the Lower House could, by passing a vote in any matter, alter the state it was in. What opinion the Lawyers came to in this matter was kept a secret. It was not doubted but they were against the pretensions of the Lower House. The Queen made no answer to their address; and it was believed, the reason was, because the answer must, according to the opinion of the Lawyers, have been contrary to what the Lower House expected: And therefore the Ministers chose rather to give no answer, and that it should seem to be forgot, than that such a one should be given, as would put an end to the debate, which they intended to cherish and support.

Mean while, the Lower House looked on what they did in the matter of their declaration as a master-piece; for, if the Bishops concurred with them, they reckoned they gained their point; and, if they refused it, they resolved to make them, who would not come up to such a positive assertion of the divine right of Episcopacy, pass for secret favourers of Presbytery. But the Bishops saw their designs, and therefore Jan. 20. the Archbishop sent them for answer, that the preface to the form of Ordination contained a declaration of three orders of Ministers from the Apostles times, viz. Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, to which they had subscribed: But that he and his brethren conceived, that, without a Royal licence, they had not authority to attempt, enact, promulge, or execute, any Canon, &c. by whatever name it might be called, which should concern either doctrine or discipline: And that this was the opinion of divers learned persons in their own House: But that they took notice of their zeal for the Episcopal order, and hoped they would act agreeably to it in their future proceedings.

The Lower House, on February 11, replied, That they wondered at their Lordships caution: That they would not so much as satisfy the lower Clergy, that they did not dissent from them, even in this point too. They took the freedom to tell their Lordships, that they misrecited the statute of 25 Hen. VIII, and signify to them, that declaring their sense concerning a truth in Religion, speculative only, and without requiring either assent or obedience, was not forbidden by that act: And intimate their sorrow, that the reflections of ignorant and malicious men, of which they complained to their Lordships, were rather likely to be confirmed by their Lordships answer: And discover their resentment of the closing admonition, &c. After this reply, these matters were at a full stand, when the Session came to an end by the prorogation of the Parliament.

From those disputes in Convocation, divisions Great d. ran through the whole body of the Clergy, and, to fix these, new names were found out: They were distinguished by the names of HIGH CHURCH and LOW CHURCH. All that treated the Dissenters with temper and moderation, and were for resigning constantly at their Cures, and for labouring diligently in them; that expressed a zeal against the Prince of Wales, and for the Revolution; that wished well to the present

1702-3. present war, and to the alliance against France, were represented as secret favourers of Presbytery, and as ill-affected to the Church, and were called Low Churchmen: It was said, that they were in the Church only, while the law and preferments were on it's side; but that they were ready to give it up, as soon as they saw a proper time for declaring themselves: With these false and invidious characters did the High party endeavour to load all those, who could not be brought into their measures and designs.

Clarendon's History published.
The Queen touches for the Evil.
* See Note, Rapin I. p. 137.

About this time the Earl of Clarendon's History was put to the press, after it had lain by thirty years, it being thought a proper season to publish it. For it was now become fashionable to cast reproach on her Parliamentary right, on purpose to affront That of the late King, as well as the right of the House of Hanover. To do it the more effectually, the Queen's heirship was traced down from Edward the Confessor, and, as a visible proof of it, the Queen was put upon curing the King's Evil, according to the divine gift, descended on all the hereditary Kings from the Confessor*. Care therefore was taken to insert it in the public news-papers, in one of which it was said: Yesterday the Queen was graciously pleased to touch for the King's Evil some particular persons in private; and, three weeks after, December 19, Yesterday, about 12 at noon, her Majesty was pleased to touch at St James's about twenty Persons afflicted with the King's Evil. Again, Bath, October 6, A great number of persons coming to this Place, to be touched by the Queen's Majesty for the Evil, her Majesty commanded Dr Thomas Gardiner, her chief Surgeon, to examine them all particularly, which accordingly was done by him; of whom but thirty appeared to have the Evil, which he certified by tickets as is usual, and those thirty were all touched that day privately, by reason of her Majesty's not having a proper convenience for the solemnity. To make the thing the more serious, an Office is inserted in the Liturgy, to be used on this occasion (1).

Engagement between Bombow and du Casse. Burchet.

The beginning of the war in America proved unfortunate through the loss of Vice-Admiral Bombow. He was sent into the West-Indies with a Squadron of men of war, and stationed at Jamaica to watch the enemy in those parts. He sailed from Port-Royal, the 11th of July 1702, in order to join Rear-Admiral Whetstone. But having advice, on the 14th, by the Colchester and Pendennis, who joined him that day, that du Casse was expected in those seas, he went in search of him. Du Casse was carrying the Spanish Duke of Albuquerque to his Government of Mexico with a good Number of troops on board. Bombow took and destroyed by the way eight or ten merchant-ships, and a man of war capable of carrying fifty guns. The 19th of August, he discovered du Casse with four large ships of war, a frigate of thirty guns, which had been a Dutch fly-boat, a small ship full of soldiers, with a sloop and three small vessels. Bombow, giving him chase, and resolving to fight him, disposed his ships in the following line, the Defiance, Captain Richard Kirby; the

Pendennis, Captain Thomas Hudson; the Windsor, 1702-3. Captain John Constable; the Breda, Vice-Admiral Bombow with Captain Fogg; the Greenwich, Captain Cooper Wade; the Ruby, Captain George Walton; and the Falmouth, Captain Samuel Vincent. Being uneasy to see some of his ships so long in coming up, and in disorder, and observing, that the Defiance and Windsor did not make any haste to come into their station, he sent to them to make more sail. The night approaching, the Admiral steered along side of the enemy, and endeavoured to keep near them, though not with a design to attack them before the Defiance was a-breast of the headmost ship. But, before this was done, the Falmouth in the rear attacked the fly-boat, and the Windsor the ship a-breast of her, as also did the Defiance. Soon after the Admiral was obliged to do the same, having received the fire of the French ship a-breast of him. The Defiance and Windsor, after they had received two or three broadsides from the enemy, broke from the line out of gun-shot. The two sternmost ships of the French lay upon the Admiral, which very much galled him, the ships in the rear not coming up as they ought. It was four o'clock when the engagement began, and it continued till it was dark. The Admiral perceiving, that the French would decline fighting, if they could, resolved to pursue them; and, believing that, if he led himself on all tacks, the other Captains, for shame, would not fail to follow his example, he ordered the following line of battle, the Breda, Defiance, Windsor, Greenwich, Ruby, Pendennis, and Falmouth. On the 20th, at break of day, the Admiral was within gun-shot of the enemy; but the other ships, except the Ruby alone, which was up with him, were three, four, and five miles a-stern. At two in the afternoon, the sea-breeze rising, the enemy got into a line, making what sail they could. The other ships not coming up, the Admiral in the Breda, with the Ruby, plied their chase-guns on them till night, when they left off, but kept them company all night. The 21st, at day-light, the Admiral, being on the quarter of the second ship of the enemy, and within point-blank shot, the Ruby being a-head of him, the French ship fired at the Ruby, which she returned. The two French ships, which were a-head, fell off, there being little wind, and brought their guns to bear on the Ruby. The Breda brought her guns to bear on the French ship, and shattered her very much, which obliged her to tow off. But the Ruby was likewise so much shattered in her masts, sails, and rigging, that the Admiral was obliged to lie by her, and send boats to tow her off. This action held almost two hours, during which the rear-ship of the enemy was a-breast of the Defiance and Windsor, who never fired a gun, though within point-blank. At eight o'clock in the morning, a gale of wind springing up, the enemy made what sail they could, and the Admiral chased them, in hopes to come up with them. At two that afternoon, the Admiral got a-breast of two of the sternmost of the enemy's ships; and in hopes

(1) Charles Barnard the Surgeon, who had made this Touching the subject of his rillery all his life-time, till he became Body-Surgeon at Court, and found it a good perquisite, solved all difficulties by telling his companions with a sneer: Really one could not have thought it, if one had not seen it. Oldm. II. p. 302.

1702-3. to disable them in their masts and rigging, he began to fire on them, as did some of the ships a-stern; but, lying a-breast of them, they pointed wholly at him, which galled his ship much in her rigging, and dismounted two or three of the lower tire guns. However, the Admiral made what way he could after the French, who used all the shifts possible to avoid fighting. The 22d, at day-light, the Greenwich was about three leagues a-stern, though the signal for the line of battle was never struck night nor day. The rest of the ships were indifferently near, except the Ruby; the enemy being about a mile and half a-head. At three in the afternoon, the wind turned to the southward, which before had been easterly. This gave the enemy the weather-gage; but, in tacking, the Admiral fetched within gun-shot of the sternmost of them, firing at each other; but, his line being much out of order, and some of his ships three miles a-stern, nothing more could be done. In the night the enemy was very uneasy, altering their course very often between the West and North. The 23d, about break of day, the enemy was about six miles a-breast of them; and the fly-boat separated from the enemy out of sight. At ten o'clock, the enemy tacked, the wind being at East North-east, but variable. The Admiral fetched within point-blank shot of two of them, passing broadsides at each other. Soon after he tacked, and pursued them what he could. The Ruby being disabled, the Admiral ordered her for Port-Royal. At eight that evening, the English Squadron was about two miles distant from the enemy, they steering South-east, and very little wind; then at North-west, and variable. The Admiral steered after them, but all his ships, except the Falmouth, fell much a-stern. At twelve the enemy began to separate. The 24th, at two in the morning, the Admiral came up within call of the sternmost, and fired a broadside, which the French returned. At three o'clock, by a chain shot, Denbigh's right-leg was broke in pieces, and he was carried down; but this brave man presently ordered his cradle on the quarter-deck, and continued the fight till day, when appeared the ruins of a ship of about seventy guns. The Falmouth assisted in this affair very much, but no other ship. Soon after day, the Admiral saw the other part of the enemy coming towards him with a strong easterly gale; and at the same time the Windsor, Pendennis, and Greenwich, a-head of the enemy, came to leeward of the disabled ship, fired their broadsides, passed her, and stood to the southward. Then the Defiance, following them, came also to leeward of the disabled ship, and fired part of her broadside. The disabled ship did not fire above twenty guns at the Defiance, before she ran away before the wind, lowered both her top-sails, and ran to leeward of the Falmouth, which was then a gun-shot to leeward of the Admiral, knotting her rigging, without any regard to the signal of battle. The enemy seeing the other two English ships standing to the southward, and expecting they would have tacked and stood with them, they brought to with their heads to the northward; but, seeing these three ships did not tack, bore down upon the Admiral, ran between the disabled ship and him, and shot his main-top-sail yard, and shattered his rigging much; none of the other ships being near him, nor taking any notice of the battle-signal. The Captain of the Breda fired two guns at those ships a-head, in order to put them in mind of their duty; and, on the other hand, the French, seeing this great disorder, brought to, and lay by their own disabled ship, manned her again, and took her in tow. The Breda's masts being much shattered, she lay by till ten o'clock, and, being then refitted, the Admiral ordered the Captain to pursue the enemy, who was then about three miles distance to leeward, having the disabled ship in tow, steering North-east, the wind at South South-west. The Admiral, in the mean time, made all the sail after them he could, the battle-signal being still out: But, the enemy taking encouragement from the behaviour of some of the English Captains, the Admiral ordered Captain Tegg to send to the Captains to keep their line, and to behave themselves like men. Upon this, Captain Kirkby came on board the Admiral, and pressed him very earnestly to desist from any further engagement: which made the Admiral desirous to know the opinion of the other Captains; and, accordingly, he ordered Captain Tegg to make the signal for all the other Captains to come on board. Most of them concurring with Captain Kirkby in his opinion not to fight, the Admiral, not being able to prevail with them to come to any vigorous resolutions, thought it not fit to venture any further; though, at this time, he was a broad-side of the enemy, and had a fair opportunity of fighting them, the masts and yards in a good condition, and few men killed, except those on board the Breda.

After this unfortunate action, Admiral Benbow returned to Yarmouth, where, on the 28th of October, he issued out a Commission to Rear-Admiral Holburne, and some Captains, to hold a Court-Martial, for the trial of the Captains Kirkby, Conibet, Wade and Constable, who were charged with cowardice, breach of orders, and neglect of duty in the late engagement of Carthagena. The Court-Martial held four days, and, upon full proof, Kirkby and Wade were sentenced to be shot to death, but the execution to be repitied till her Majesty's pleasure should be known. Constable was cleared by his own officers and men of cowardice; but, the other crimes being proved against him, he was cashiered from the Queen's service, with imprisonment during her pleasure. And, as for Holburne, he died some days before the trial. Captain Leisour, Commander of the Falmouth, and Captain Tegg, Commander of the Admiral's ship, were also tried for signing a paper with Captain Kirkby and the rest against engaging the French, when there was so fair an opportunity, with probability of success. But, upon their alledging, that they did it only because they were persuaded, considering the cowardly behaviour of those Captains, that, upon another engagement, they would wholly desert, and leave the Admiral in the Breda, and the Falmouth, a prey to the enemy: And, upon the character given by the Admiral, and others, of their great courage and gallant behaviour in the battle, the Court thought fit only to suspend them from their employment in her Majesty's service; and withal, that their suspension should not take place, till the High Admiral's pleasure should be known. The Queen confirmed the sentence passed upon the Captains Kirkby, Wade, and Constable, who were 1702-3. sent to England in the Bristol man of war; and, upon their arrival at Plymouth, on the 14th of April 1703, the two first were immediately shot to death.

Admiral Benbow was very sensibly concerned at this disappointment, and, having languished for some time, died at last, on the 4th of November 1702, of the wounds, which he had received in the engagement, being extremely lamented, as one of the bravest and most experienced sea-officers, that England ever bred. He was born at Shrewsbury in the County of Salop, and educated in the free-school there: And, though his family was of good rank, yet it had been so reduced, that he was bound apprentice to a waterman. He afterwards used the seas, and became a Privateer (as they themselves called it) in the West-Indies. In process of time he was made Master of Attendance at Depiford, where he continued several years. In the late war he was employed in bombarding St Malo, and by quick gradations raised to be a flag-officer, and sent Admiral of a squadron to the West Indies. He was a man of remarkable temperance, and naturally charitable. As for his military virtues, he was bold and daring, and undaunted in the midst of dangers. In a letter to his wife, after the engagement, he tells her, that the loss of his leg did not trouble him half so much, as the villainous treachery of some of the Captains under him, which hindered him from totally destroying the French Squadron. He was about fifty years old when he died.

Not long after Colonel Robert Daniel arrived at Port Royal from Carolina, and brought account, that Colonel Moore, Governor of that Plantation, marched from Charles-Town in South-Carolina with five hundred men, in order to attack a Colony of the Spaniards about three hundred miles distant, called St Augustin near the Gulf of Florida: He soon possessed himself of the town, the inhabitants retiring with their best effects into a strong fort, surrounded by a very deep and broad moat (in which they had laid up provisions enough to last them four months) where they defended themselves very obstinately. It being impossible to take this fort by storm, Colonel Moore caused it to be blocked up, and sent Colonel Daniel to Port-Royal to borrow a mortar and some shells to bombard it, and doubted not, that he should, by that means, soon force them to surrender. If this expedition had succeeded, it would have greatly contributed to the security of South-Carolina, there being no other place, from whence they could afterwards be disturbed, except a small settlement, which the French called the Palisadoes, about two hundred miles farther in the Country to the Westward. But, some French and Spanish Gallies being arrived at St Augustin before the return of Colonel Daniel, Moore was obliged to raise the blockade, and to return to his Government by land, after having burnt the ship in which he came.

Some time before letters brought advice, that some frigates of English privateers attacked a place called Toulon on the Continent, about ten leagues from Carthagena, which they took, plundered, and burnt. Thence they failed to Caledonia, went up the river Darien, and so consorting with the Indians, were carried by them in twelve days march to the gold mines at Santa Cruz de Cana near Santa Maria. The ninth day of their march, they came to an out-guard of ten men, which the Spaniards had at some distance from the place, of whom they took nine; but the other escaping gave notice at the mines of their approach, upon which the richest of the inhabitants retired from thence with their money and jewels. However the English party, which consisted of about four hundred men, being come up, took the fort, and possessed themselves of the mines, where there remained about seventy negroes, whom they set to work, and continued there one and twenty days, in which time they got above eighty pounds weight of gold dust. They also found several parcels of plate, which the inhabitants had buried at leaving that place. The English, at their departure, burnt all the town, except the Church, and returned to their sloops, bringing away the negroes. Some went further up the river in their sloops, having a design upon another gold mine, called Cibaoa; and two of the sloops commanded by Plowman and Grandy sailing towards Cuba, landed near Trinidad; and with an hundred and fifty men took the town, burnt a great part of it, and brought off a very considerable booty.

On the 7th of March, Colonel Codrington, Governor of the Leeward Islands in America, came with the Land-forces under his command on board a Squadron of men of war, with divers privateers, and other vessels, before the island of Guadalupe, receiving several shot from the shore, though without doing any other mischief, than killing one man, and wounding a boy. The Colonel stood off till the 10th, waiting for the Maidstone, and the small vessels, that carried the provision and ammunition. Upon the 12th, Colonel Byam, with his own regiment, and two hundred of Colonel Whetbam's men, landed by break of day, at a place called Les Petits Habitants, where they met with some opposition, but soon constrained the enemy to retire. About nine in the morning, Colonel Whetbam landed in a bay to the northward of a town called La Bayliffe, where he met with a vigorous resistance from all the enemies forces posted in very good and advantageous breast-works, plying the English with their great and small shot; yet, notwithstanding all their fire, the English marched up to their intrenchments with their muskets shouldered, not firing a shot, till they could lay the muzzles of their guns upon the enemy's breast-works. Here the English had three Captains killed, before they made themselves masters of the enemy's intrenchments; which they did about noon, and in an hour after, of La Bayliffe, and the Jacobines Church, which the enemy had fortified, and of ten pieces of their cannon. About two, the English took a platform with three pieces of cannon; and the marine regiment attacked the Jacobine plantation and breast-work all along the Jacobines river, which the enemy quitted upon the firing of two volleys only of small shot upon them. The next day the English possessed themselves of the great town called Basse-Terre, and forced the enemy to retire into the castle and fort, which they defended till the third of April, and then, blowing them up, retired to the mountains. The English had now nothing to do but to send out parties to burn and destroy the enemy's houses, works, sugar-canes, and provisions, to ravage the country, and to bring in what cattle and plunder they could find; after which they burnt the town to the ground, razed the fortifications, Alterations in Scotland.

Lockhart.
Whilst the Queen was bestowing her favours on the Church-party in England, some alterations were made in Scotland, which were as advantageous to the Anti-revolutioners and Episcopalians, as they were displeasing to the Presbyterians. The Earl of Marchmont, Lord Chancellor; the Earl of Melvil, President of the Council; Earl of Selkirk, Lord Register; Adam Cockburne, of Ormiston, Treasurer-deputy; Sir John Maxwell, of Pollock, Justice-Clerk; Earl of Leven, Governor of the castle of Edinburgh; and the Earl of Hyndford, one of the Secretaries of State, were all laid aside. On the other hand, the Duke of Queensberry, and the Lord Viscount Tarbat, were made Secretaries of State; and the Earl of Seafield, Chancellor; the Marquis of Anandale, President of the Council; the Earl of Tullibardin, (afterwards Duke of Abol) Lord Privy-Seal; the Lord Boyle, Treasurer-Deputy; Mr Roderick Mackenzie, of Preskon-Hall, Justice-Clerk; Sir James Murray, of Philiphaugh, Lord-Register; and the Earl of Marcb, Governor of Edinburgh-castle. And tho' all these, except the Earl of Marcb, had, at or since the Revolution, been deeply engaged against the interest of King James and his Family; yet the Duke of Queensberry and his two Dependants, the Lord Boyle and Sir James Murray, pretended to be quite of another mind: The Marquis of Anandale, Earl Seafield, and Viscount Tarbat valued themselves upon having, once, opposed King William; and the Marquis, every body believed, would, if kindly dealt with, go along with the prevailing party. But, before this change in the Ministry was perfected, the scantiness of the funds provided by the last Parliament, and the difficulties in collecting them, rendered it absolutely necessary to call a new Parliament to sit in the spring of the year 1703. And therefore the Earl of Seafield, then Secretary of State, came down from London to Scotland, to influence the elections, which by a concurrence of several accidents were so managed, that a greater number of Anti-Revolutioners were chosen than had been known in any former Parliament. At the same time, Duke Hamilton, and some others, who had been the greatest persecutors of the Presbyterians, set up for patrons of the Episcopal Clergy, and obtained from the Queen a letter to the Privy-Council of Scotland, wherein, among other things, she said: 'We do, in the first place, recommend to your care the Church now established by law, in it's superior and inferior Judicatures, such as Sessions, Presbyters, Synods, and General Assemblies; as also in the exercise of their holy functions, and in what concerns their persons and benefices. We are informed, that there are many Dissenters who, albeit they differ from the established Church in opinion as to Church-Government and Form, yet are of the Protestant Reformed Religion, some of which are in possession of Benefices, and others exercise their worship in Meeting-houses. It is our Royal pleasure, that they should be directed to live suitably to the Reformed Religion, which they profess, submissively to our Laws; decently and regularly with relation to the Church established by law, as good Christians and Subjects; and, in so doing, that they be protected in the peaceable possession of their Religion, and in their persons and estates, according to the Laws of the Kingdom. And we recommend to the Clergy of the established discipline their living in brotherly love and communion with such Dissenters.'

Encouraged by these expressions and the Queen's repeated assurances, that she would maintain the Church of England, and even the least Member of it, in all their just rights and privileges; the Episcopal Clergy framed an address, to which, with great pains and many indirect methods, they procured many subscriptions, and which was presented to the Queen, the 13th of March, by Dr Skeen and Dr Scot, introduced by the Duke of Queensberry (who nine days before had been appointed High-Commissioner) and Viscount Tarbat (2).

The Queen in her answer assured them of her protection, and endeavours to supply their necessities as far as conveniently she could, and

Address of the Scotch Episcopal Clergy. Hist. of Europe. Vol. viii.

The Queen's answer. recom-

(1) Father Daniel, though he mentions this descent of the English on Guadalupe, conceals all these circumstances to their advantage, and pretends, that they were repulsed with loss by the Sieur Auger, Governor of the Island. Monfieur de Larrey says, that, Monfieur Gabaret arriving at Fort St Mary's with two frigates, a flute, nine armed barks, and seven hundred men for the assistance of the inhabitants, the English did not think themselves a force sufficient to withstand them, and therefore reembarked. The Author of the British Empire in America, Vol. II. 187, asserts, That all the successes of this expedition were rendered fruitless, by some unhappy differences among the Commanders; though something must be imputed to the vigorous defence of the French, and the sickness of the English soldiers; which obliged the General to reembark his men, after they were so near making a conquest of the whole Island.

(2) The Address was as follows: 'We, your Majesty's most humble, dutiful, loyal, and most obedient subjects, look on it as no small blessing to have a Queen of our ancient race of Kings, who has always been a pattern of virtue,

'and a constant supporter and owner of the true Reformed Orthodox Religion; and who, since her coming to the Crown of her illustrious Ancestors, has shewn such good and generous inclinations to make all her subjects live happily, that we have presumed most humbly to address your Majesty to take into your Royal consideration the condition of the subjects of the Episcopal persuasion in this Kingdom. It is not unknown to your Majesty, the hard measure and discouragements they met with of late years, particularly those of the Clergy, though they have always behaved themselves (as their principles oblige them to do) peaceably and submissively to supreme authority.

'May it therefore please your sacred Majesty to take those into your Royal protection, and give liberty to such parishes, where all or most of the heritors and inhabitants are of the Episcopal persuasion, to call, place, and give benefices to Ministers of their own principles, which the Presbyterians themselves can have no reason to complain of; for, if the plurality, they pretend to, be true, by this Act of Grace, neither their Churches nor Benefices are in hazard: Which favour will oblige us more and more, out of grati-

1702-3. recommended to them to live in peace and Christian love with the Clergy, who were by law invested with the Church-Government in her ancient Kingdom of Scotland.

Proclamation of Indemnity. The next thing, which the enemies of the Revolution improved to their advantage, was a proclamation of Indemnity published by the Queen, on the 6th of March 1702-3. It was set up for a maxim by the new Ministry, that all the Jacobites were to be invited home; and therefore the proclamation was of a very large extent, indemnifying all persons for all treasons committed before April last, without any limitation of time for their coming home to accept of this grace, and without demanding any security of them for the future. Upon this considerable numbers of Jacobites came over to Scotland from St Germain's and other parts of France, though they had forfeited their lives to the law by corresponding with the enemy, and practising against the Government in King William's Reign. Some of them pretended to be new converts, and together with others at home, who had stood out all King William's time, qualified themselves to sit in Parliament by taking the oaths. The Anti-revolutioners, being proud of this accession of strength, thought themselves in a condition to prescribe terms to the Government, and carried matters to an unaccountable height.

Proceedings in the Parliament of Scotland.

This was the posture of affairs in Scotland, before and at the time, when the Queen found it necessary to satisfy the Nation by calling a new Parliament. The Episcopal party thought themselves so secure of a majority, that they every where gave out, they should be able to vote down Presbytery, and to restore Patronages, or at least to carry a Toleration, so as their own Clergy might be called to benefices, as well as the Presbyterians. Nor did their confidence terminate in humbling the Presbyterians of Scotland, but they flattered themselves also with the hopes of mortifying the Revolution-party of the Church of England; and this they were prompted to expect by a North-country Clergyman, turned out in 1694 for refusing the oaths to King William, whom they had since employed as their Agent at London, and who, upon the death of that Prince, in a letter to those, who employed him in Scotland, expressed himself thus: 'The Church of England was so much out of order during the late Reign, that it will take some time to put matters right, which her Majesty is firmly resolved to see to with all convenient haste.' Thus they endeavoured to spread the belief, that the Queen was their friend, while the greatest part of them not only refused to swear allegiance to her, but some of those, who had taken the oaths, made no scruple openly to confess, 'that they swore to her only as a Tutor or Regent, during the minority of her supposed brother.' By this it appears, that the whole Kingdom of Scotland was in a ferment at the sitting down of the Parliament. The Country-party (which took its rise from the affair of Darien, and had disputed the legality of the continuance of the Convention-Parliament) of which Duke Hamilton and the Marquis of Tweeddale were the leaders, insisted upon the redress of those grievances, which the Country laboured under in the former Reign. The Presbyterians in general, and others of Revolution principles, who were headed by the Duke of Argyle, were alarmed at the bold proceedings of the Anti-Revolutioners, of whom the Earl of Hume was chief. This divided the Country party among themselves; for, most of that party in the late Reign being Revolutioners, they were jealous of the new accession of Anti-Revolutioners; and therefore it was not possible for them to concert measures together. These jealousies were heightened by new discoveries, which the Anti-Revolutioners had made of their sentiments in Council and elsewhere: That they were against ratifying the several steps of the Revolution, and the proceedings of King William's Parliament on that head; but thought best to pass it over as a thing extraordinary and out of course; and alledged, that all parties might be safe enough under the shelter of her Majesty's general Indemnity. The Revolutioners knowing well, that, according to the old Constitution of the Kingdom, general pardons granted out of Parliament afford but little safety, when questioned in Parliament, despised the motion, and thought fit to leave those to plead the Indemnity, who believed they needed it, but conceived themselves not to be of that number, and therefore resolved upon a Parliamentary ratification of the Revolution. This they judged to be the most effectual way to prevent after-blows from the opposite party, whose designs became more suspicious by their insisting on a dissolution of the garrison of Inverlochy, which was a great curb upon the Popish Highlanders, and rigid Prelatists of the North, the great strength of the Anti-Revolution-party.

In this disposition of affairs the Parliament met at Edinburgh, the 6th of May 1703, and, the Duke of Queensberry, her Majesty's Commissioner, having taken his seat on the Throne, the Queen's letter was read, wherein she recommended to them to raise a supply for the forces, to encourage trade, and to proceed with wisdom, prudence, and unanimity (1). Then the Lord High-Commissioner, and the Earl of Seafield Lord Chancellor, made speeches, enlarging upon the heads of the Queen's letter. This done, Duke Hamilton, after a speech proper to the subject, offered the draught of a bill, for recognizing her Majesty's undoubted right and title to the Imperial Crown of Scotland, according to the declaration of the Estates of the Kingdom, containing the claim of Right, which was received and read the first time, and a second reading unanimously ordered, the 15th of May, when the Queen's Advocate, Sir James Stuart,

'gratitude as well as duty, to send up our prayers to Almighty God, that the same good providence, which places your Majesty upon the Throne, and has blessed the beginning of your reign with such glorious success, may preserve your Majesty for a blessing to these lands; and that we may never want

'a true Protestant of the same Royal Blood to govern us while sun and moon endure.'

(1) See the account of the proceedings of the Parliament of Scotland, which met at Edinburgh, May 6. 1703, published in 1704, and also Lockhart's Memoirs.

(1) The

1703. Stuart offered an additional clause, "That it should be treason to quarrel her Majesty's right and title to the Crown, or her exercise of the Government from her actual entry to the same." This clause being read, it was urged by some, that it was dishonourable to her Majesty, because it implied, that the House were giving her Majesty an Indemnity for the actings and exercise of her power since her Accession to the Throne. It was answered, that the words meant only in general her Majesty's right to exercise her power. To which it was replied, that, whatever was the meaning of those, who had offered the clause, yet the words could admit of no such meanings, unless either the last part of the clause was altered thus, her being in the exercise of the Government. To this it was again answered, in behalf of the clause, That by the late Queen's Mary's death, without heirs of her body, the right of Succession came to the Queen; upon the prospect of King William's death, seeing by the entail she was to succeed before any children of his body. But that the exercise did never accrue to her till his actual death and her actual Accession; and that therefore it was proper, not only to recognize her right to the Succession; but also to recognize her actual exercise, and to secure it by a sanction of treason. To this it was replied by the Duke of Hamilton's friends, that these rights spoken of did not import any other, than the apparent right of an heir before or after his immediate Predecessor's death; the first of which naturally vanishes upon the existence of the second. That the act, as at first offered, fully recognized these and all manner of rights, which were or could be in her Majesty's person; but that the clause now offered did most dishonourably superadd a ratification and sanction of her Majesty's exercise, and must point at one of these three things: First, either it supposed, that there had been something lame and defective in her Majesty's right and title abovementioned, which had been, since her actual Succession, supplied by her Majesty's acts of Administration and exercise, and therefore her exercise was proposed to be ratified towards validating her infirm title. But, as there was not the least defect in her Majesty's right and title, therefore this clause was unnecessary and dangerous. That, in the second place, the clause insinuated, that her Majesty, since her Accession, had exercised some acts of administration; to indemnify which, a vote of this House seemed necessary. That, whatever might be charged upon the Ministry, it was the highest indignity done to her Majesty, to expose her exercise of her Royal power to the least suspicion by such a clause. And, in the last place, that no other reason could be given for the tenaciousness of the Ministry in promoting a clause so dishonourable to the Queen, but that they themselves must be conscious, that, contrary to law, they had been instrumental in advising her Majesty, to exercise some acts of administration, such as the calling together the late Parliament, which had continued during all the time of the late Reign, and promoting in it some Commissions, Laws, and Powers, beyond the limitations, which determined the being, and circumscribed the power of that Parliament: And, being sensible, that their advice might very justly rebound upon themselves, they shuffed in this dishonourable clause, hoping, under the name of her Majesty's exercise, to shelter themselves: But that, whatever might become of this clause at this time, it was hoped, that the wisdom of the House would, in due time, pass a censure on those advices, which were like to discompose her Majesty's quiet, and endanger the welfare of the Nation. The Duke of Hamilton concluded with saying, 'That he had the honour of offering this act for recognizing her Majesty's authority, right, and title; that he had been in hopes, that so dutiful an act would have passed the vote of this House with all imaginable cheerfulness; and that he was both sorry and surprized to find any thing thrown in, which could create the least demur in it; but let those answer for it, who were the authors.' After a long debate, it was again moved, that instead of the words, her exercise of the Government, the following words might be added, her being in the exercise of the Government. But, by the concurrence of the Cavaliers, it was carried by a considerable majority, that the clause brought in by the Queen's Advocate should be added to the act, which, on the 19th of May, was touched by the sceptre, and made a law (1); but, before that was done, Duke Hamilton desired, 'That it should be remembered, that, at passing this act, it was expressly declared, that the meaning of the Advocate's clause could affect only the Queen's exercise of her Government, and not the actings of her Ministry: And that, therefore, whatever challenge might be given afterwards to the illegality of the actings of the late Parliament, might not be considered as a violation of this act.'

After the act had received the Royal assent, the Earl of Hume, who was one of those, that had qualified him since King William's death, that had presented the draught of an act for the supply, but, before it was read, the Marquis of Tweeddale said, that he had an overture to make to the House, which he hoped would, by reason of its importance, be preferred to all other business. After some debate, it was agreed, that the draught and overture should both be read, provided, that nothing should be spoken to either. And accordingly the act for supply was read, as was afterwards the Marquis of Tweeddale's overture for a resolve of Parliament, that, before all other business, the Parliament might

Lockhart.

(1) The act ran thus: The Estates of Parliament considering, that, by the death of the late King William of ever glorious Memory, the Crown and Royal dignity of this Kingdom is by right devolved upon Queen Anne, our present gracious Sovereign, conform to the declaration of the Estates of this Kingdom; therefore the Estates of Parliament for themselves, and in the name and behalf of the whole subjects of this Kingdom, assert, recognize, and acknowledge, her Majesty's Numb. XXXIX. Vol. III.

undoubted right and title to the Imperial Crown of this Kingdom; and her Majesty, with advice and consent of the said Estates of Parliament, doth statute and declare, that it is, and shall be high-treason in any of the subjects of this Kingdom, to disown, quarrel, or impugn her Majesty's right and title to the Crown of this Kingdom, or her exercise of the Government thereof, from her actual entry into the same.

1703. "might proceed to make such conditions of Government, and regulations in the constitution of this Kingdom, to take place after the decease of her Majesty and Heirs of her body, as should be necessary for the preservation of their Religion and Liberty." Both which overtures were ordered to lie on the table.

Lockhart. The compliance of the Cavaliers with the Court in the act of Recognition was extremely censured by many of their party; but they were induced to gratify the Queen in this point, out of expectation of being intrusted with the administration of affairs; for which reason it was likewise unanimously resolved, in a full meeting, that the Earl of Hume should the next day make the motion for a supply. And, upon these accounts, the Duke of Queensberry renewed his engagement to stand firmly by them, and inform the Queen what signal services they had done. But this good correspondence did not last long; for, within two or three days, the Duke's deportment induced many of the Cavaliers to suspect his sincerity. A writer of that party is of opinion, that the Duke was once seriously embarked with them, but left them upon this occasion. On the day the Earl of Hume was to move for a supply, his Grace called a Council, and acquainted them of it; with which all agreeing, they adjourned with a design to support the Earl of Hume's motion. A few minutes after the Duke of Argyle, Marquis of Annandale, and Earl of Marchmont, waited upon the High-Commissioner, and, withdrawing privately with him, told him, "That they had been that morning with a considerable number of Parliament-men, wherein it was resolved to move for an act ratifying the Revolution, and another the Presbyterian Government, and press to have them preferred to the act of supply, which they were certain to carry; but first they thought fit to acquaint his Grace with the design, and ask his concurrence." The Duke begged them to forbear, because he had now an opportunity of obtaining a supply; and, if he slipped that, he might never have another; and promised, that, when this was over, he would go into whatever they proposed. But the others refused to comply, being rather willing, that there should be no supply granted at all, than it should proceed from the Cavaliers: and thus they left the High-Commissioner in great perplexity, who durst not venture to push the act of supply, knowing, that the Duke of Hamilton and his party would join the Duke of Argyle and his friends, and so the act would be rejected. On the other hand, he foresaw, what Sir James Murray of Philiphaugh had that morning intimated to him, That, if he supported the Duke of Argyle in his designs, the Cavaliers would leave him; by which means his interest would be diminished, and he be obliged to depend on the Duke of Argyle, Marquis of Annandale, and other Revolutioners and Presbyterians. While he was in this suspense, the Duke of Argyle, who had more interest with him than any other person, soon returned, and, in a private conversation, represented to him the improbability of his succeeding by the methods, which he was then upon; and dextrously awakened his jealousy of the Duke of Hamilton, who, notwithstanding what had happened of late, had more interest with the Cavaliers than any other, and who, as soon as they had gained their point, was likely to become their leader. This, together with the dread of being abandoned by the Duke of Argyle and the Marquis of Annandale, wrought so powerfully with the High-Commissioner, that, from that moment, he resolved to desert the Cavaliers; but, the better to carry on his designs, he resolved at the same time to dissemble, as much as possible, with them, which however availed him but little.

On the 26th of May, the Commissioner from the Throne informed the House, "That, having now fate twenty days, he did not doubt but they were all convinced, that the present state of affairs required a competent supply for maintaining the army: That the act, offered a week before for that purpose, had ever since lain upon the table: Wherefore he desired, that it might be now read; and promised, that they should have full time afterwards allowed them to go upon other business." Notwithstanding this speech, it was moved, that, before the supply, the Marquis of Tweeddale's overture should be taken into consideration. Upon this the debate turned into a competition, Whether the Act of Supply, or the Overture, should first take place? In behalf of the Overture, was urged the great importance of it; and in behalf of the Supply, the necessity of it, and the Commissioner's promise, that after the first reading of the Supply-act, there should be time given for other business. To this a Member answered, "That he had all the deference imaginable for the Lord Commissioner's assurances, and doubted not but the whole House had the same; but he doubted extremely, that his Grace could be master of himself in that point. Who knows, added he, but that, after all his Grace's good purposes, the Treasurer of England may cause to adjourn the House, when he shall think fit, notwithstanding all the assurances, which the Ministry can give. It is too well felt, that the influence of foreign Counsels, from one corner of the world or other, have determined Scots affairs for these many years; and there is no appearance of discontinuing these practices." He concluded, "That from the matter of this overture might arise such settlements, as might make a Scots Nation stand upon a Scots bottom; and therefore it was fit to prefer the confederation of it to any other business whatsoever." (1).

After

(1) Another Member urged, upon the point of the abrupt Adjournment of the Parliament, "That it must still be fresh in every man's memory, that insults were made upon the sovereignty and independence of this Nation, in the matter of their late trading Company, both before their settlement in Darien by the legal actings of the Scots Parliament, and by the scandalous memorials given in by the English Resident at Hamburg, most falsely representing the Scots Company as private persons, having no authority; as also, by the said Resident's using threatening denunciations and expressions against the Hamburgers, if they should enter into an trading Society with them: And likewise, after that Company was settled in Darien, by their most barbarous and inhuman execution of some proclamation.

1703. After several warm speeches and long debates, the House came to this resolve, 'That the Parliament will proceed to make such acts, as are necessary or fit for securing our Religion, Liberty, and Trade, before any act for supply, or any other business whatsoever.' Whereupon the Marquis of Athol offered 'an act for the security of the Kingdom, in case of her Majesty's decease.' But, before it was read, the Duke of Argyle offered his act, ratifying the late Revolution, and all the acts following thereupon; Mr Fletcher of Salton, an act, containing several limitations upon the Succession, after the death of her Majesty, and the heirs of her body; the Earl of Rothes, an act, that, after her Majesty's death, and failing heirs of her body, no person coming to the Crown of Scotland, being at the same time King or Queen of England, should, as King or Queen of Scotland, have power to make peace or war, without the consent of Parliament; the Earl of Marchmont, an act for securing the true Protestant Religion and Presbyterian Government; and Sir Patrick Johnson, an act, allowing the importation of all sorts of wines, and other foreign liquors: All which acts were placed, and ordered lie on the table.

On the 1st of June, an act for Toleration to all Protestants, in the exercise of religious worship, presented by the Earl of Straibmore, being read, a strong representation was offered against it in the name, and at the appointment of the late General Assembly, which concluded with these words: 'That they were persuaded, that to enact a Toleration for those of the Episcopal way (which God of his infinite mercy avert) would be to establish iniquity by a law and would bring upon the promoters thereof, and their families, the dreadful guilt of all those sins and pernicious effects, that might ensue thereupon.' The promoters of the Toleration finding by this representation, that it was like to meet with great opposition, agreed not to insist upon it, lest thereby they should offend and lose many, who, at present, sided with them against the Court.

Thus, not only all the hopes of the Episcopal party for a Toleration (which they had made no doubt of carrying) were entirely lost, and every thing relating to the Church continued in the same state in which it was during the late Reign, but the Presbyterians got a new law in their favour, which gave them as firm a settlement, and as full a security, as law could give. For, on the 3d of June, an act passed for preserving the true Reformed Protestant Religion, and confirming Presbyterian Church Government and Discipline by Kirk Sessions, Presbyteries, Provincial Synods, and General Assemblies, as agreeable to the word of God, and the only Government of Christ's Church within this Kingdom (1). Nor was this all. For, on the 7th of June, the Parliament proceeded to consider the Duke of Argyle's act, which consisted of three clauses: For ratifying and perpetuating the first act of King William's Parliament, that the three Estates then met together were a lawful and free Parliament: For declaring it high-treason to disown the authority of that Parliament, or to endeavour, by writing, or speaking, or other open act or deed, to alter or innovate the claim of Right, or any article thereof. The two first clauses were agreed to without any opposition; but the third, relating to the claim of Right, raised a very warm debate. It was alleged, that many libels had been spread, reflecting on the claim of Right, and tending to un hinge the present happy settlement. To which it was answered, 'That there were standing laws, by which the authors of such libels might be punished; but that the import of such a general and peremptory clause would be of most dangerous consequence: That it would fetter men in their common conversation, which, though never so innocent, might, by these words, endeavour by writing or speaking, bring all the subjects, whether in the Ministry or not, into daily snares; and, in short, that it would bind up the Government, and the wisdom of the Nation itself, in all succeeding ages, from making such alterations and reformation, as, in course of time, and various circumstances of things, should be judged necessary.' To this purpose James Moore of Stenneywood said, 'That he was sure, and every body knew, that the Shire of Aberdeen, which he had the honour to represent, was of Episcopal persuasion; and if, after this act was passed, his countrymen should, in discharge of their own consciences, in a regular way address the Sovereign or Parliament (which, by the claim of right, is the privilege of every subject) for a rectification of the present Presbyterian Establishment, which, in his opinion, was neither amations issued out against them. That, whether these most injurious stretches were calculated really for the sake of an interest altogether foreign to this Island, it was not proper here to dispute; but, that it was certain, that this had raised an insuperable jealousy in the Scots Nation, which could not fail, some time or other, to break forth into consequences dangerous to both Nations. And therefore he concurred with those noble and worthy Members in promoting the Overture, from which he should expect, that some laws should be enacted towards regulating the Administration and Government at home, as might deliver a Scots Prince and Ministry from foreign influence, and might thereby compose those hurtful jealousies, in all times coming, to the mutual peace and quiet of the whole Island.'

(1) Lockhart, in his Memoirs, says, Many Members argued against it, but none with more spirit than Sir David Cunningham of Milnraig, who urged, That it was uncharitable to affirm, as this act did, that the Presbyterian Government was the only Church of Christ. To this the Marquis of Lothian replied, 'That the clause was right, since he was sure the Presbyterian Government was the best part of the Christian Religion;' which raised great mirth in the House. However, the act passed; but it was evident, that the Presbyterian party was not so confident as had been imagined; and that, if the Queen had been as Episcopal in Scotland as in England, she might easily have overturned Presbytery. For at this time the House consisted of about two hundred and forty Members, thirty of whom voted against the act, and eighty-two were Non-liquets, which last were all Episcopal, but chose to be silent, either because there was not then a formed design against Presbytery, or in order to please the Court; so that, properly speaking, there was not a plurality of above sixteen voices for the act; among whom such, as the Duke of Hamilton, the Earl of Eglington, and many others, were no ways Presbyterians; so that, had the Queen designed to introduce Episcopacy, it would not have been any hard task to have done it.

(1) The 1703. 'neither infallible nor unalterable, he desired to know, whether such an address should import treason?' To this Sir William Hamilton of Whitlow answered, That indeed this act did not preclude addressing for a Toleration; but he was of opinion, that if, after it was passed into a law, any person should own, that he thought Presbyterian Government a wrong Establishment, and that Episcopacy ought to be restored, such a person was guilty of high-treason. This occasioned a long and warm debate, wherein the dangers, that would arise from this act, both to the Government and the Subject, were fully laid open. However the question for approving the act was carried in the affirmative, tho' there were sixty Members against it, and many Non-liquets * of several of the country party, who were Presbyterians; but all the Ministry and their Dependents went into it, except the Marquis of Aibol, the Lord Justice Clerk, the Lord Viscount of Tarbat, and some of their and the Lord-Commissioner's friends, who, at this time, began to break with the Court, and join in a particular correspondence with the Cavaliers.

* Or, Silent Members.

Barnet.

By this act the Presbyterian Government acquired new strength; for the claim of right was not only confirmed (one article of which was against Episcopacy and for Presbytery) but it was declared high-treason to endeavour any alteration in it. The late King, though it had been often proposed to him, would never consent that this should pass into an act. He said, he had taken the Crown on the terms of that claim, and therefore would never make a breach on any part of it; but he would not bind his Successors, by making it a perpetual law. Thus a Ministry, that carried all matters relating to the Church to so great a height, yet, with other views, gave a fatal stroke to the Episcopal interest in Scotland, to which King William would never give way.

As soon as the Cavaliers perceived, that the Duke of Queensberry's friends and dependents appeared against the act of Toleration, and for the acts establishing the Presbyterian Government, and ratifying the late Revolution, they immediately concluded, that they were betrayed, and declared this opinion in a meeting of the Cavaliers. Upon this it was resolved to send four of their number, the Earls of Hume and Strathmore, George Lockhart of Carnwath, and James Ogilvy of Boyne, to represent to him, how much they were surprized to find his friends behave after such a manner; and that they hoped he would remember his vows and promises, and how they had served the Queen. He excused his conduct, as necessary to please such of the Ministry, as were so inclined, lest otherwise the Queen's affairs should suffer prejudice; and then he renewed his former promises, with the most solemn protestations. They replied, 'That they believed this would not satisfy those, who had sent them to him; and that neither his Grace nor the Queen could blame them for looking to themselves, since it was plain, he was embarked with a party, and entered into measures quite contrary to the capitulation made and agreed to between him and them.' Having made a report to their Constituents, it was unanimously resolved not to enter into any concert with the Court, or any other party, but to stand by themselves firm to one another, and jointly go into such measures, as, when proposed by any party, should be, by the majority of themselves, esteemed for the interest of their country. This engagement they all faithfully performed during this whole Session, except only the Earls of Belcarras and Dunmore, who adhered to the Court. Hitherto they had been firm to their party, especially Belcarras, who had, after the Revolution, been sometime in France, and not many years before this, had obtained liberty to return home.

The bill, which occasioned the longest debates in this remarkable Session, was that for security of the Kingdom, in case of her Majesty's decease. From the 9th of June to the 30th, there was little done in relation to the public, except the reading this act, and reasoning upon the several clauses of it; for it was agreed, that it should be considered paragraph by paragraph. When therefore, on the 9th of June, the bill was taken into consideration, many speeches were made, recommending to the Members to proceed in that matter with the utmost caution and deliberation. Among the rest, the Lord Belhaven made a deduction of the several projects, which, from Henry the Seventh's time, had been set on foot towards uniting the two Kingdoms, with an enumeration of the instances of decay in the Scots Nation, since their Kings resided in England; and of the opportunities they had lost of making good terms for themselves, by the artful offers of an Union made to them by their neighbours to lull them asleep; concluding, that by this act they had it in their power to provide against any further disappointments.

The act of Security.

After the House had entered upon the consideration of some clauses of the act, it was represented, that it would be necessary to rescind the second act of the Third Parliament of King Charles II. establishing the Succession of the Crown in the next blood in the Royal line, of whatsoever Religion. Whereupon the Queen's Advocate took out of his pocket an act ready drawn for rescinding the said act, so far as the same was inconsistent with the claim of right, and the present Settlement made in King William's time. Against this it was urged, that, by the claim of right, all Popish Successors being excluded, they should by this clause determine the Succession to be lodged in the family of Hanover, who were the nearest Protestants of the Royal blood. And though the generality of the Presbyterians, and all the Ministry, except the Marquis of Aibol, Viscount Tarbat, and the Lord Justice Clerk, pressed to have this act read the first time; yet it was carried by a considerable majority, that it should lie on the table (1).

On

(1) The Author of the proceedings in this Parliament says (p. 228.) This clause, for rescinding the act of 1681 about the Succession, occasioned great debates among the several parties upon very different views. The St Germain's party were against rescinding it totally, because, being made in favour of the Duke of York and the lineal Succession, they think it may still give them a handle to bring in his pretended son. The Hanover party was against rescinding it totally, because they think that, Popish Successors being excluded by the claim

1703. On the 1st of July, the act for the security of the Kingdom being read, a Member moved for inserting in it such preliminaries, in case of a Successor not of the Queen's own body, as should sufficiently secure the Scots Nation against the misfortunes arising from the influence of foreign Counsels. This was seconded by a great many Members; and, after some debate, it was agreed, that the act should be considered paragraph by paragraph. The next day it was resolved, that the Estates of the Nation should meet upon the 20th day after the Queen's decease, and that the Government should be lodged in their hands on that day. The 5th of July, a clause was added, excluding Papists from being Members of the Estates; and, on the 6th, another clause was offered, "That no Englishman or Foreigner, having a Scots title, and not having an estate of a thousand pounds sterling yearly rent within this Kingdom, shall have place and vote in that meeting of Estates." Against this clause it was urged by the Marquis of Athol, that the privilege of Peerage belonged to some by Birth, and to others by immediate Creation. That, in the first of these cases, the private birthright of some Noblemen might be injured; and, in the other, the prerogative seemed to be impaired. To this it was answered, first, that this clause was no incroaching upon the property and birthright of those Peers, who were to be excluded at that time, seeing the Exclusion was for that time alone, at which there was an affair to be negotiated, which was purely a Scots concern, viz. the chusing a Successor for the Kingdom of Scotland. Secondly, That possession and property is the true title for representation; and, though the Crown, which is the fountain of honour, be not restrained to dispense titles according to that rule, yet, in this very nice case, there could be no exception made against excluding those from voting, who, not only had no possession or interest in Scotland to represent, but who, on the contrary, had possession and interest elsewhere, which might clash with the interest of the Scots Nation. Thirdly, That in the affair, which was to be the subject-matter of the consideration of that meeting of the Estates, the nominating a Successor, the English were already predetermined and pre-engaged in their own choice. And though it should prove to be the interest of Scotland, not to enter into the same nomination with England, yet those predetermined Peers, who had estates in England, would never risque them, to give a fair vote for the interest of Scotland, where they had no estate to lose; and therefore the clause was insisted on as proper. After some debate, the clause was put to the vote, and carried in the affirmative; but, before voting, the Marquis of Athol protested, that this vote might not prejudice the undoubted right of all Scots Protestant Peers: To which protest several other Peers adhered. Then the Marquis of Annandale, the Duke of Argyle, and the Earl of Kincardine also protested, that the vote might not be prejudicial to the privileges of the Peers of Scotland, whether they be Scotsmen or English. On the 7th of July, it was moved, That such limitations, as should be thought necessary to be put upon the Successor, might be considered; and particularly a clause was offered, that the Kingdom should not be engaged in any war, but by advice and consent of the Parliament. This clause being read, a long debate ensued, wherein it was urged, "That the settling the limitations upon the Successor was more proper to be done by that Parliament or Meeting of the Estates, which should name the Successor; and that the whole act of security might perhaps be lost, if it should be cramped by such limitations." Upon which, it was carried by a majority of twenty-six voices, not to proceed to the limitations on the Successor in this act. However, it was afterwards voted, that the act touching peace and war should be considered, next after the act of security.

On the 9th of July, upon a debate relating to the Regency, in case the Successor to be named were under age, it was resolved to refer that matter to the wisdom of the meeting of the estates. Five days after it was moved, that the clause, empowering the meeting of the estates to declare a Successor to the Crown of the Royal line and of the Protestant Religion, might receive the addition of these words, of the true Protestant Religion, as by law established, within this Kingdom. Against which it was urged, That the Coronation-oath was a sufficient test to engage the Successor (being a Protestant) to maintain the Church, as by law established. To this it was answered, "That since the wisdom of this House had thought fit to exclude Papists, who professed the doctrine of Transubstantiation, from having any access to a Scots Government; so he saw no reason, why Lutherans, who profess the doctrine of Consubstantiation, ought not likewise to be excluded; and more especially considering, that by this means the Family of Hanover would be excluded, which was both proper and necessary, considering that the English had named that family for their Successor. For he saw plainly, that the Scots Nation must resolve to be in continual slavery, if they should go into the same nomination with England, unless they had such conditions of Government settled within themselves, as might secure their liberty and trade; of which he saw no great appearance at this time, since it was evident from several struggles within these few days, that the Ministry were in concert with the Ministry of England, to continue the Scots Nation under the same slavery as formerly; and therefore he did second that clause, and would second any other clause whatsoever, which might put the Scots Nation under a disinterested Government from that of England, seeing they could not obtain such reasonable terms, as might make them easy under one and the same Successor." Upon this occasion Mr Grant informed the House, that claim of right, the next Protestant in the line succeeds of course, and the Duke of Hamilton and the Country-party were for rescinding it totally, to cut off both those pretensions; and, when it came to the vote, it was carried only by one, and that too a great Minister of State, that it should not be totally rescinded, but in so far only as it might countenance a Popish Successor.

1703. that he had instructions from the Barons of the Shire of Inverness, whom he represented, not to enter into any terms of Succession, the same with England, unless first there should be such conditions of Government, and terms of Union of Trade, previously concerted, passed, and ratified by the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, as should put the Scots Nation upon an equal foot with their neighbours. After some debate, the question was stated, either to add the words offered to the clause, or to rest upon the security by the Coronation-oath; and it was carried for resting on the Coronation-oath.

On the 16th of July, a clause was offered by the Earl of Roxburgh, "providing the Successor to be named by the meeting of the Estates be not the Successor to the Crown of England, unless in this Session of Parliament there be such conditions of Government settled and enacted, as may secure the honour and independency of the Crown of this Kingdom, the freedom, frequency, and power of Parliaments, and the religion, liberty, and trade of the Nation from the English or Foreign influence." It was urged against the clause, that it imported limitations upon the Successor, which had been by a former day's vote excluded out of this act. To which it was answered, That by this clause there was no limitation designed to be brought into this act, but that the clause did only in general secure a capitulation for some proper conditions of Government to be settled in the Session of Parliament, in case the Nation should think fit to name the same Successor with England, in the same manner as the other day's resolve had made a capitulation for the act of peace and war in particular. It was again objected, That, as this clause was conceived, the making of the conditions of Government was too peremptorily restrained to this Session of Parliament; and therefore it was moved, that, instead of this Session of Parliament, it should be, in this or any other Session of Parliament. To this it was answered, "That whilst the Members were designing to secure a capitulation for settling such conditions of Government, as might answer no less important ends than the honour and safety of the Scots Crown, relieving the Nation from slavery, and thereby to extinguish the jealousies, which must, for all future ages, make both Nations uneasy; that, when they were prosecuting such good things with all imaginable dispatch in this Parliament, they were told of an expedient for a new delay, by turning them off to some future Parliament; which, upon the whole matter, aimed at nothing less than an entire disappointment of those generous designs. And therefore it was hoped, that the wisdom of the House would enter

"immediately into the clause, as at first offered." The question being put, whether to add the clause, or not, some Members threw in a great many new expedients, which occasioned several warm speeches; and it being late, and the House in great heat and confusion, several Members pressed for a delay. The Chancellor seconded this motion, adding, that this debate should be resumed the next sitting, and, by the Commissioner's order, adjourned the Parliament for four days. This adjournment without a vote, in the midst of a debate, was immediately protested against as illegal, and an address to the Queen was framed and subscribed by above seventy Members; but, on the 20th of July, the next day of meeting, the Chancellor declaring, "That there was no manner of design by that adjournment to encroach upon the privilege of the Parliament;" a stop was put to the address. The next day, the House proceeded on the Earl of Roxburgh's clause; but, after reading it, there was another offered by the Queen's Advocate, "providing, that, after her Majesty's decease, without heirs of her body, the same person shall in no event be capable to be King or Queen of both Kingdoms of Scotland and England, unless a free communication of trade, the freedom of navigation, and the liberty of the plantations be fully agreed to, and established by the Parliament and Kingdom of England, in favour of the Kingdom and Subjects of Scotland, at the sight, and to the satisfaction of this or any ensuing Parliament of Scotland, or the said meeting of Estates." After this clause was read, it was moved, that it should be added to the act of Security, instead of the clause offered by the Earl of Roxburgh; and this motion was seconded by all the Ministry and their Dependents. After a long debate, some urging, to have the clause offered relating to the conditions of Government added to the act of Security; others insisting, to have the clause relating to communication of trade added; it was proposed, that both the clauses should be joined, and added to the act of Security, which, on the 26th of July, was, after a long debate, carried by a majority of seventy-two voices; But the Marquis of Annandale, Lord President, and the Duke of Argyle protested against it, to which several others adhered. Other clauses were afterwards offered, and, notwithstanding the strong opposition from the Ministry, added to the act, which, on the 13th of August, was read, and approved by a majority of fifty-nine voices (1). The act of Security being thus solemnly passed, instances were made to the Commissioner, that he would give the Royal Assent, which, it was urged, would encourage the Members to go the more cheerfully upon the matter of subsidies.

(1) The other clauses were:

That the Estates should not nominate a Successor, till twenty days after their meeting: That it should be high-treason to administer the Coronation-oath, but by the appointment of the Estates; or to own any person as King or Queen, after her Majesty's decease, till they take the Coronation-oath, and accept the terms of the claim of Right, and such conditions as shall be settled in this or any ensuing Parliament: That, in case there be no Parliament at the Queen's death, the Administration shall be in the hands of such Members of Parliament, and of the Privy-Council last in being, as shall be in Edinburgh, or come there before the 20th day: That all Commissions of the civil officers, except Sheriffs, Stewards, and Justices of the Peace, and of all military officers above Captains, shall, upon the Queen's decease, be void: That all Protestant Heretors and Freeholders, and all Burghs, shall forthwith provide themselves with fire-arms, for all the fencible men within their respective bounds, and discipline them once a month.

(1) The

1703. dies. And it was also represented, that the Negative to any act approved in Parliament had never been asserted before the year 1660. But the High-Commissioner declined giving an answer till the 10th of September, when he told them, in a speech, that he had received the Queen's pleasure, and was empowered to give the Royal Assent to all the acts voted in this Session, excepting only the act for Security of the Kingdom. Upon this, it was moved, that the Queen should be addressed for her assent; but, the question being put, it was carried against this address by twelve voices. Both before and after the Commissioner had refused to pass the security-act, there were several remarkable motions and bills, particularly upon the subject of limitations. On the 6th of September, the Earl of Marchmont gave in an act concerning the Succession, which occasioned very great heats in the House, because he had named in it the family of Hanover, and was therefore rejected by many, as contrary to the act of security. Whether the Earl was provoked to bring in this overture by the madness of the St Germain's party, or by the jealousy of some of those of the Revolution, it appeared, that it was not done by concert, and therefore gave a general disgust. After this, such limitations were offered, as almost turned the Monarchy into a Commonwealth, with the empty name of a King: For it was proposed, that the whole Administration should be committed to a Council, named by the Parliament, and that the Legislature should be entirely in the Parliament, by which no shadow of power was left with the Crown, and it was to be merely a nominal thing. But, after many warm debates, these matters were put off by a sudden adjournment. However, one act of limitation upon a Successor passed, which was of some importance. It was declared, that, after her Majesty's decease, no King or Queen of Scotland should have power to make war or peace, without consent of Parliament. An act also passed, allowing the importation of French wines, and other liquors, which, as was pretended, were to be imported in the ships of a neutral State. The truth was, the revenue was so exhausted, that they had not enough to support the Government, without such help. Those, who desired to drink Claret, and all concerned in trade ran into it, by which means the bill was carried, though with great opposition. The Jacobites were also for it, since it opened a free correspondence with France. It was certainly against the public interest of the Government, in opposition to which private interest does often prevail. As there were acts in being, that made slanderous speeches or writings punishable with death, it was now enacted, that such crimes should be punished according to the demerit of the transgression, by fining, imprisonment, or banishment. An act also passed in favour of the Company trading to Africa and the Indies; and another, for a Commission concerning the public accounts. Moreover, the Parliament made void the Commission for treating of an Union with England, and discharged any other Commission for that end, without their consent. Notwithstanding this, and the acts for ratifying the claim of Right, and establishing the Presbyterian Church Government: Since the Duke of Queensberry would not pass the act for the security of the Kingdom, nor suffer them to proceed in their limitations upon a Successor, they would give no supply; and he was forced to adjourn the Parliament to the 12th of October, without having any subsidies granted. By this means the pay of the Army, with the charge of the Government, was to run upon credit; and matters were like to come to extremes, for a national humour of rendering themselves a free and independent Kingdom had so inflamed them, that they seemed capable of the most extravagant things that could be suggested to them (1).

Thus

(1) The proceedings of the Parliament, after the 13th of August, when the act for security of the Nation was finished, may be seen in the following extract: When the Parliament found the Commissioner would not give an answer to their instances for passing the Security act, it was moved, on the 24th of August, that the House should go upon the consideration of some overtures for securing the liberties of the Nation, conformable to the tenour of the grand resolve, entered into the 28th of May. Against which it was urged, that, according to the terms of that resolve, the House had already made considerable progress in the matter of religion and liberty; and that trade was next in order. Upon which several acts for trade were offered and read, particularly, an act allowing the importation of all sorts of wines and other foreign liquors. As this overture was opposed by several Members as prejudicial to the trade of the Nation, it was alleged by one of the Ministry, that it was very well known, that the customs on wines was the chief fund for the Civil List; and unless the importation of French wines were restored, the Government could not be supported, considering, that the funds were now very far deficient. This was seconded by another Minister, representing the great benefit which would arise to the Kingdom in general, and to the Towns in particular, by the French trade; and concluding, "That unless that act was passed, the subsidies might blow up this town, and burn their ships." To this a Member answered, "That, since he heard such harsh expressions as these come from about the Throne, for no other reason, but to amuse and mislead the boroughs with pretended advantages of trade, the Members must take the liberty to tell their mind the more freely. That he did openly aver, that it was plain to all this House, that the Nation was ruined in all its concerns both of liberty and trade, by the most treacherous artifices of those, who were in the Ministry." Upon this some about the Throne said, that these expressions ought to be taken notice of. To which the same Member answered, "That he heard it murmured about the Throne, that his expressions ought to be taken notice of; but he desired any body to take notice of them, for they all knew too well, that what he had spoken was a certain truth." It was again urged in behalf of the act, "That upon farther inquiry it would be found, that the trade with France was a trade beneficial to the Nation, because the French took Scots goods in return for their wines." So that, after a long and angry debate, the act was ordered to be marked a first reading.

The 6th of September, the Earl of Marchmont desired leave of the House to withdraw an act, containing some limitations upon the Successor, which had been lately presented by him, but had not yet been read. His desire being granted, as soon as his Lordship had withdrawn that act, he begged leave to present another in its room, which he desired might be read. This was an act to settle the Succession on the House of Hanover;

Remarks on this Session.

Thus ended this famous Session of Parliament, in which the greatest part of the Ministry had abandoned the Duke of Queenberry, and particularly the Earl of Seafeld, Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Atbal, Lord Privy-Seal, and the Lord Viscount Tarbat, Secretary of State, with all who depended on them; yet, upon the conclusion of the Session, the Marquis was made a Duke, and the Lord Tarbat Earl of Cromarty; which looked like rewarding them for their opposition. The Marquis of Douglafs, though under age, was likewise made a Duke; the Viscounts of Stair and Rosberry were created Earls of the same name; the Lord Boyle, Earl of Glasgow; James Stuart of Bute, Earl of Bute; Charles Hope of Hopton, Earl of Hopton; John Crawford of Kilbiruce, Viscount of Garnock; and Sir James Primrose of Carrington, Viscount of Primrose. Soon after, the Queen resolved to revive the order of the Thistle, which had been raised by her Father, but was let fall by the late King. It was to be carried in a green ribbon, as the George is in a blue, and the glory was in the form of a St Andrew's Cross, with a Thistle in the middle. Argyle and Atbal, Annandale, Orkney, and Seafeld, were the first, who had it, the number being limited to twelve.

To such a height did the disorders in that Kingdom rise, that great skill and much secret practice seemed necessary to set matters right there. The aversion and jealousy towards those, who had been most active in the last Reign, and the favour shewn to those, who were in King James's interest, had an appearance of bringing matters out of an excess to a temper; and it was much magnified by those, who intended to flatter the Queen, on design to ruin her. Though the same measures were taken in England, yet there was less danger in following them there than in Scotland. Errors might be sooner observed,

Hanover; and, as his Lordship had not signified what the import of it was, no body opposed his motion for the reading of it; but when the Clerk came to that paragraph, where it substitutes the Princess Sophia, &c. no sooner were those words out of his mouth, but the whole House was in a flame. Some moved to have the overture burnt; and others to have the Earl, who offered it, called to the bar, and others to have him sent to the castle. After the House had shewed a general dissatisfaction against the thing, at length the Chancellor procured silence, and the Clerk was ordered to read it through; and the Earl of Marchmont desired it might be marked a first reading, and was seconded by the Marquis of Lathian and another Member. But they were so warmly opposed, that there was not a vote demanded; and the Earl of Marchmont proposed only, that the overture might be marked in the minutes, expressing the import of it, urging, "That the minutes ought always to record the matter of fact as passed in Parliament." This was warmly opposed by a Member, who said, "That though it is both customary and proper, that every thing, which is moved in the House, be marked in the minutes; yet the act now offered by the Earl of Marchmont ought to be distinguished by some particular mark of indignation from this House, seeing the generality of the Members had sufficiently shewn their sentiments, in relation to the nomination of a Successor, and had so frequently in this Session declared it to be their opinion, that the Nation was at present in a very improper state for nominating a Successor the same with England: And therefore the best he could say, in behalf of this most unreasonable overture, was to move, that it might be buried in oblivion, and not marked in the minutes." Another Member said, "That he heard an act offered, which seemed to contain some things inconsistent with the act of Security, which had lately passed the vote of the House; and it was not unlikely, that the jealousy, which the Members had contracted, that this act of Settlement was not to receive the Royal assent, prompted them to find out new acts to supply it. That he very plainly foretold, that this would promote the jealousy, which this Nation had already contracted against their Neighbours; and therefore he moved, that the Lord Chancellor might, as the mouth of the House, address her Majesty's representative to give the Royal assent to that act." This motion was seconded by a great many Members; and, the Earl of Marchmont still insisting to have his act marked in the minutes as a privilege naturally due to all overtures, the question was stated, whether to mark the overture in the minutes, or not? And it was carried in the negative by fifty-seven votes.

On the 9th of September, it was represented by a Member, "That this Parliament had now fate very "long, and, after a vast expence of money, time, and pains, had at length passed an act for the Security of the Nation; and as it would be some recompence to the Members to see that act receive the Royal assent, so it would, no doubt, be very satisfactory to the Nation. And therefore he begged, that her Majesty's Commissioner would give the Royal assent to the act." This was seconded by a great many Members; and, at length, a motion was made, that the House should address her Majesty to give the Royal assent. Against this it was urged, That the Parliament had already done their part, by voting the act, and what remained to be done, was the Queen's part; and that there was no need for addressing, seeing it was notified to the Queen, that the Parliament had voted the act. To this it was answered, "That, no doubt, it was made known to her Majesty by her Ministry, that this act had passed the vote of the House: But that every body knew very well, that Courtiers never fail to represent the black side of things; and therefore he concurred in that motion of seconding the former vote of the House, by a dutiful address to her Majesty." After some further debate, and several warm speeches, it was represented by the Marquis of Tweeddale, that it was somewhat too hasty to address her Majesty for her assent, until the House knew from the Commissioner, whether he was already instructed for that purpose; and therefore he begged, that the Commissioner would declare his intentions. A great many Members seconded this motion, and pressed, that the Commissioner would give the House so much satisfaction, as to let them know, whether or no he was instructed to pass this act. But his Grace did not think fit to give any answer in the matter. Thereupon another Member, Mr Fletcher of Salton, said, "That he had seldom seen any benefit from addresses, and for that reason he was very little concerned, whether this House did at present address her Majesty, or not. That he thought, that the acts, which the House had voted, were but very slender fences for the security of the Nation: That the Nation's case was desperate, and the provisions must be suitable. That he found some people were too forward in promoting the Succession of the House of Hanover, and others that of the Prince of Wales; and that they were both contented to sacrifice their own and their Nation's liberty, rather than not accomplish their designs. That he did consider it as a very melancholy prospect for this Nation, that they were not to expect either of those two Successors, but at the rate of being slaves, not to their Princes, but to their Neighbours; for supposing, that, upon the one hand, this Nation should submit either willingly, or by Commission, to the Successor of England, without such conditions of Government within themselves, as should secure them against the sole influence of the English Ministry 1703. served, and easier corrected, where persons are in view, and are watched in all their motions; but this might prove fatal at a greater distance, where it was more easy to deny or palliate things, with greater assurance. The Duke of Queenberry's ingrossing all things to himself increased the disgust at the credit he was in. He had begun a practice of drawing out the Sessions of Parliament to an unusual length; by which his appointments exhausted so much of the revenue, that the rest of the Ministers were not paid; which will always create discontent. He trusted entirely to a few persons, and his conduct was liable to just exceptions. Some of those, who had the greatest credit with him, were believed to be engaged in a foreign interest; and his passing, or rather promoting the act, which opened a correspondence with France, was considered as a design to settle a commerce there;

and upon that his fidelity or his capacity were much questioned.

Whilst things were in this situation in Scotland, there were also high discontents in Ireland, occasioned by the behaviour of the Trustees for forfeited estates. The Duke of Ormond was the better received, when he went to that Government, because he came after the Earl of Rochester, till it appeared, that he was in all things governed by him; and that he pursued the measures, which that Earl had begun to take, of raising new divisions in that Kingdom; for, before that time, the only division in Ireland was that of English, and Irish, Protestants and Papists. But now an animosity came to be raised there, as in England, between Whig and Tory. The wiser sort of the English resolved to oppose this all they could, and to proceed with temper and moderation. The Parliament

Ministry upon their joint Prince, in that case they were no better than slaves: Or, if, on the other hand, the Scotts should force their Successor upon the English, without securing to themselves the conditions beforementioned, they must still resolve to be under the same dependence, when Conquerors, as when Conquered. And therefore, that it was absolutely necessary for them to settle such conditions of Government, as might place them in a reasonable state of freedom and security, who never might be the Successor; and that to this purpose he offered an act, which might answer those ends.' The first draught ran thus: 'Our Sovereign Lady, with the advice and consent of the Estates of Parliament, statutes and ordains, that, after the decease of her Majesty (whom God long preserve) and failing heirs of her body, no one shall succeed to the Crown of this Realm, but is likewise Successor to the Crown of England, that is under the limitations following; which, together with the Coronation-oath and claim of Right, they shall swear to observe: That all places and offices, both civil and military, and all pensions formerly conferred upon our Kings, shall ever after be given by Parliament: That a new Parliament shall be chosen every Michaelmas Head-court, to sit the 1st of November thereafter, and adjourn themselves from time to time till next Michaelmas; and that they chuse their own President: That a Committee of thirty-six Members, chosen by and out of the whole Parliament, without distinction of estates, shall, during the intervals of Parliament, under the King, have the Administration of the Government, be his Council, and accountable to Parliament; with power, on extraordinary occasions, to call the Parliament together.'

After the act was read, the Member said, 'That he had not in this act made any nomination of a Successor: and it was his opinion, that this Nation was not, at present, in a condition for such a nomination; but seeing there was a great zeal amongst some for promoting the Succession of Hanover, and no less among others for promoting that of the Prince of Wales; therefore, to satisfy both, he had another act ready to offer, but which he need not read, seeing it was the very same with what was already offered in every circumstance, excepting only that it had a blank in it for nominating a Successor. That he moved, that the Members might go to work, and pass this act; and, immediately after that, let each party try their strength, and let the strongest carry the Nomination, and fill up the blank, according to the mind of the plurality. That thus far he begged leave to declare his opinion, That he had rather concur in nominating the most rigid Papist with those conditions of Government, than the truest Protestant without them.' This motion was seconded by several Members; but others urged against it, That the House was now in the middle of an act of trade, which ought to be finished before any other business. After some debate, and a great many new instances to the Commissioner, to give the Royal assent to the act of Security, a Member said, 'That he found this House was to get no satisfaction from her Majesty's Commissioner at this time; and it seemed, the Nation was to expect as little good; and therefore, the next best clause was to prevent damage as much as possible. That it was to be noted, that there were lately some meetings betwixt some subjects of both Kingdoms, in which several matters were agitated, in relation to an Union between the two Nations. That he should not descend to an inquiry into the nature of the powers, by virtue of which the subjects of Scotland did meet upon such a treaty. That those things might be spoke to in due time; but at present he humbly conceived, there were two things worthy the consideration of this House: The one was, that, seeing such a treaty had been entered upon by some of the subjects of this Nation, it seemed strange, that nothing of that sort had all this Session of Parliament been laid before this House; and therefore he moved, That it be now laid before the House, to be considered by the Members. The other thing was, that, seeing there were a great many things to be said in relation to that treaty, which might be more seasonably taken notice of at another time, therefore he moved, that a stop might be put to any further proceedings in that matter.' This motion was seconded by a great many Members; and after some debate, there was a motion made and acquiesced to without a vote, 'That the progress, and advances, made in the said treaty, might be laid before the Parliament next federunt, and declared by a vote of Parliament, that the Commission granted for the said treaty was determined and extinct; and that there should be no new Commission for treating of any Union betwixt the Kingdoms of Scotland and England, without consent of Parliament.' After this was over, a great many Members pressed the Commissioner to give the Royal assent to the act of Security; but no answer was made from the Throne. At length a Member said, That, seeing so much had been said without an answer, it was better to leave the Commissioner to his reflections; that, perhaps, he would be ready to comply against next day; and that, therefore, he moved the House should proceed to finish the act against the exportation of wool (which had been marked the first reading) and this was accordingly gone upon, put to the vote, and approved.

The next day, September 10, the Commissioner made the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It was with great uneasiness to me, that I was 7 P "forced

1703. was opened at Dublin, on the 21st of September, with a speech by the Duke to both Houses, importing, 'That it were to be wished, they were in a Condition to provide for such fortifications, as would much conduce to the safety of the Kingdom, and particularly at Limerick, and for building the Barracks. But that, which her Majesty expected from the Commons at that time, was only, that the publick debts be discharged, and the revenue made equal to the expence of the Government, which was much increased by the charge of the Barracks; and they were found so useful, and so great an ease to the country, that they ought not to be neglected.' He assured both Houses, 'That, since the Queen had done him the honour to place him in that station, as his duty and gratitude obliged him to serve her Majesty with the utmost diligence and fidelity; so his inclination and interest, and the examples of his Ancestors, were indispensable obligations upon him to improve every opportunity, to the advantage and prosperity of this his native Country: And that, since he had no other design, than what they all aimed at, the Queen's service, and the good of their Country, he only recommended to them, that they might unite and agree in the same measures, and pursue them with wisdom and temper.' The Commons, being returned to their House, made choice of Allen Brodrick, the Queen's Solicitor-General, to be their Speaker. The first thing both Houses went upon was the framing addresses, both to the Queen and the Lord-Lieutenant, which carried the compliments to the Duke of Ormonde so far, as if no other person, besides himself, could have given them the settlement, they expected from his Government. The Trustees of the forfeited estates had raised a scandal upon the Irish Nation, as if they designed to set up an independence upon England; so that the Commons, in their address to the Queen, said, 'They could not, but with the deepest concern, take notice to her Majesty, that her enemies, by many groundless and malicious calumnies, had misrepresented them; the sad and severe effects whereof they too sensibly felt; and especially, as if they thought themselves, or desired to be, independent of the Crown of England. That therefore, to vindicate their names from such aspersions, they declared and acknowledged, that the Kingdom of Ireland was annexed and united to the Imperial Crown of England.' The Commons, on all occasions, forced to be silent yesterday, when so many did appear earnest, that I should speak. I have all the inclinations in the world to give you full satisfaction; but I thought, that I ought not to be pressed to give the Royal assent, or to declare my instructions in Parliament, which I had made known to many noble and worthy Members, besides the Queen's service.

Now that these instances are let fall, and that you have proceeded to other business, to testify how willing I am to give you contentment in any thing, that is in my power, I tell you freely, that I am empowered to give the Royal assent to all the bills, that shall be presented to me, An act for the Security of the Kingdom. You need not give me any other consideration. At the same time her Majesty expects you will mind your own safety, in making necessary provisions for the troops upon the present Establishment; and that you will put the trade and customs on that foot, that the Government is supported. And I intreat your Lordships to finish these as quickly as possible, that this Session may be put to a speedy and happy conclusion.

The Commissioner having ended his speech, a Member said, 'That, had it been spoke in the beginning of the Session, it might have saved a great deal of labour and expence; for this was plainly to tell the Parliament, that all their business was to raise a subsidy for the army, and customs for the Civil List; and that then the Session should be happily concluded by an adjournment.' This was followed by a debate concerning the Queen's negative. It was urged, 'That the third act of the first Session of the first Parliament of King Charles II. (which is the only act, upon which the negative is founded) was only made to obviate a practice, which had been usurped by the estates in the time of the late rebellion, of making laws by their own vote, and promulgating such votes, as having the authority of laws, without the Royal assent: And then the said act it is declared, That the Royal assent is necessary and essential to give the force of a law to the vote of the House; but from thence it could not be inferred, that the assent could be refused to an act offered, and solemnly passed the House; and that,

After some time, the House resolved, That it would please to gratify the House in giving the Royal assent to the act. But the question being put, Proceed to other business, by twelve voices. After this, Mr Pringle, who had been Secretary to the treaty of Union, was ordered to lay the minutes of that treaty before the House at their next sitting.

On the 13th of September, it was moved, that, seeing the Royal assent had been refused to the act of Security, therefore it was proper to go upon other overtures for the security of the Nation upon the event of the Queen's demise. Against this it was urged, that the House had concluded by a late resolve to go upon overtures for trade: To which it was answered, That this last resolve had been entered into, after the act of Security had passed the vote of the House, and whilst it was not doubted, that the Royal assent would be given to it; but that now, the Royal assent being refused, the House did naturally recur to the state of their first grand resolve, entered into the 28th day of May. To which it was again replied, that the act of Security was indeed now laid aside, but perhaps it might afterwards receive the Royal assent, when her Majesty had farther considered of it; and that, besides this act of Security, there were some other very valuable acts passed in consequence of that grand resolve; such as the act securing Presbyterian Government, the act ratifying the claim of right, &c. to which acts the Royal assent was given.

The question being put, To proceed either upon the act for limitation, or upon overtures for trade? It was carried, To proceed upon the act for limitation. This vote being over, the act for importing wine was read, and the Marquis of Tweeddale said, That, seeing no arguments could prevail with some people to part with this scandalous and pernicious act, he thought it was very proper, that all honest men, who wished well to the trade of their Country and the honour of their Queen, should clear themselves of the least assent to it: And therefore, before the act was put to the vote, he entered a protestation for himself, and in the name of such as should adhere to it, 'That this act, allowing 1703. expressed their hatred of the Trustees, and of their proceedings; yet they would not presume to meddle with any thing they had done, pursuant to the act that had passed in England, investing the trust in them. Accordingly, on the 25th of September, they resolved, that all the Protestant Freeholders of that Kingdom had been falsely and maliciously misrepresented, traduced, and abused, in a representation of them made in a book, intitled, The Report of the Commissioners, appointed to inquire into the Irish forfeitures; in which were these words: "And indeed it does appear, that the Freeholders of this Kingdom, through length of time, and by contracting new friendships with the Irish, or by inter purchasing with one another, but chiefly through a general dislike of the dispositions of the forfeitures, are scarce willing to find any person guilty of the late rebellion, even upon full evidence." And it appearing to the House, that Francis Annesley, Member of it, and John Trenchard, Henry Lansford, and James Hamilton, were authors of that book; it was resolved that they had scandalously and maliciously misrepresented and traduced the Protestant Freeholders of that Kingdom, and endeavoured to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the People of England and the Protestants of that Kingdom. Upon which Annesley was expelled the House, with this particular mark of disgrace, that no warrant should be issued this Session to elect a new Member for Down-Patrick in his room. Hamilton being dead, no question was put about him; and Trenchard was got safe into England.

The Trustees hastily finished their affairs before the meeting of this Parliament; and some London Merchants, understanding there were good pennyworths to be had, sent Agents over to Dublin, to purchase, in a lump, what was left unsold. To do it as a Corporation, they examined the powers in the Charters of several Companies in London, that they might purchase under one, by which the Company was empowered to buy lands without stint, or, at least, a very large one; such was the Charter to the Sword-Blade Company, erected and incorporated to set up that Manufacture in Cumberland, or one of the neighbouring Counties, for the use of the army, on the breaking out of the first Confederate allowing the importation of French wines and brandy, ought not to pass, as being dishonourable to her Majesty, inconsistent with the grand Alliance, wherein she was engaged, and prejudicial to the honour, safety, interest, and trade of this Kingdom. He desired, that this proposition might be marked and inserted in the records of Parliament; and the same was adhered to by twenty Peers, forty-three Representatives for Shires, and twenty-one Representatives of Boroughs; and then, the clause being put to the vote, it was carried in the affirmative. The next day, September 14, a clause was offered, That no Scots ships should trade directly with France now in time of war; but, several Members objecting against it, the act was carried by a vote without it.

On the 15th of September, it was urged by a Member, 'That this had been a very tedious and expensive Session of Parliament: That most part of it had been employed in adjusting the act of Security of this Nation after her Majesty's decease. That, seeing this act of Security was now laid aside, it was therefore high time for the House to employ themselves in making new conditions. That there was an act now lying upon the table, offered by Mr Fletcher, which he moved might be the standard of future deliberations, as that formerly offered by the Marquis of Athol had been the foundation of the act of Security.' This motion being seconded by many Members, the Lord Treasurer represented, that the Parliament had late a long time without providing funds for the army, which must of necessity be supported, both for maintaining the peace at home, and for defending the Nation against invasions from abroad: That there was an act now upon the table, which had been before presented for that purpose: And he moved, that it might receive a first reading. This was opposed by a Member, who said, 'That it seemed very unreasonable to propose a supply at this time, when the House had so much to do for the security of the Nation; it being well known, that this Parliament should have no time allowed them after the supply was granted; though, for his part, he saw no body unwilling to go upon the supply in due time, yet he thought it was very little encouragement for the Nation to grant a supply, when they found themselves frustrated of all their labour and expence for these several months, and when the whole Nation saw, that the supplies serve for no other uses, but to gratify the avarice of some insatiable Ministers.' This occasioned along debate, and many warm speeches were made in behalf of Mr Fletcher's act in particular, and on the state of the Nation in general; and at length Mr Fletcher himself spoke in favour of his own act, entering into the detail of it. Among the many arguments for promoting it, and the good consequences which would arise from it, he urged, 'That it would save a great sum, which was yearly expended by such as went to Court to look after places. That this sum might serve for a good stock for trade. That by this act the Nation would be free from the influence of English Ministers, by having their own places bestowed by a Scots Parliament. That such an Establishment would not turn the form of the Scots Government into a Commonwealth, since there are precedents for it in some of the most absolute monarchies in the world, particularly China, where all offices are bestowed by the Prince upon recommendation from his several Councils in the several parts of his Kingdoms: Nor would the prerogative be impaired by it; for, as to the Prince's concern, it was only changing hands betwixt the advice of an English Ministry and that of a Scots Parliament. That the Scots Parliament must know, who are persons fit for the service of their Prince and Nation better than English Ministers, who, through their being acquainted with the Scotsmen and Scots affairs, might commit mistakes hurtful to both Nations. That the English would be gainers by this act, as well as their Prince, since all the advantage, they had by the present Establishment, was to have the vanity of directing Scots affairs by the humour of a few of their own Ministers, who (as appeared of late) had very much mistaken the interest of England, in some directions they gave relating to the Scots affairs. That by these means Scotland was impoverished, and rendered incapable of giving that joint assistance against the common enemy, which otherwise they might, if they were allowed to manage their own trade and business to the best advantage. That these difficulties must certainly make the Nation uneasy in their present condition, and would certainly dispose them to lay hold on any opportunity of amending their condition, though to the ruin of their Neighbours.'

The Chancellor made an answer to this Speech, representing the Act as laying a scheme for a Commonwealth, and tending to innovate the constitution of the Monarchy. And then the Ministry offered a state of a vote for giving a first reading either to Mr Fletcher's

Confederate war. They were enabled to purchase lands to build mills upon the rivers, and to provide for the reception and entertainment of a great number of Manufacturers from Germany; which not turning to account, the Sword-Cutlers fold their Charter to those London Merchants, who purchased about twenty thousand pounds a year of the forfeited estates, and some of the best of those estates, for a sum not much greater than it was said the Grantees, or those that held of them, offered, without putting the public to a penny charge: And these Merchants, by the stile of The Governor and Company, for making the Sword-Blades in England, prayed, that heads of a bill might be brought in, for enabling them to take conveyances of lands in Ireland. But the 1703. Parliament were so little disposed to guaranty the bargains of the Trustees, that their petition was ordered to lie upon the table; and there it lay with others that had no better success (1).

The Commons expelled Mr John Ayscull (who was at the same time Member of the House of Commons in England) for a strange book he had published*, to prove out of Scripture, that a true Christian ought to have so great a stock Note, of faith, as to be translated to heaven without P. 520. dying. He had, as Agent to the forementioned Sword-Blade Company, offered to lend money to the public in Ireland, at six per cent. on condition the Parliament would pass an act to confirm er's act, or to the act of subsidy. There were many of the Country-party, who had no mind to go to the full extent of Mr Fletcher's act, but were withal resolved to go upon the consideration of overtures for the liberty of the nation. These urged another state of a vote, viz. overtures for subsidies, or overtures for liberty? But the Ministry pressed the first state of the vote. Upon which Mr Fletcher alledged, 'That he had the honour to offer an act for securing the liberties of the Nation against English influences. That it was his opinion, that the condition of the Nation was so far gone into ruin, that the provisions in this act were absolutely necessary for its relief. That he doubted not to make this appear by reasons unanswerable; but that he found some people very ready to pervert the meaning of good designs; and, lest any such bad handle should be made of an overture, which he had sincerely designed for the good of his Country, he begged leave to withdraw his overture;' adding, 'That he should be very ready to go into such overtures, as the wisdom of the House should judge most proper for the honour and safety of the Nation.' Then the other state of the vote was offered, overtures for liberty, or overtures for a subsidy. Here the Ministry were at a loss, for they knew, that overtures for liberty would be carried; and, by Mr Fletcher's withdrawing his act, they were obliged to look out for another state of a vote. This put them to a consultation about the Throne, during which time the Members called from all sides of the House for a vote upon the question, as stated, Liberty, or Subsidy, and a great many warm expressions were thrown out against the Ministry from people of all ranks. After some time spent in this manner, during which several uncertain and imperfect overtures of differing states of questions were made; the Commissioner moved from the Throne, 'That, if the House would agree to allow a first reading to the subsidy act, he did promise, that, it should not be heard of for three ensuing Sessions.' To this a Member answered, 'That he believed, that those about the Throne did not expect, that this overture would take in the House: that the import of it was plainly this, that the Act for a Subsidy should get a first reading now; then the House should have three short sittings for the Liberties of the Nation; and the fourth should complet the Subsidy: After which, the House was sure to be adjourned: But, that he was certain the House was better acquainted with the artifices of the Ministry, than to be misled by such overtures.' Another Member urged, 'That it was now plain, the Nation was to expect no other return for their expence and toil, than to be put to the charge of a Subsidy, and to lay down their necks under the yoke of slavery, which was prepared for them from that Throne.' A third Member said, 'That he insisted upon having a vote upon the question, which had been put. That he found, that, as the liberties were suppressed, so the privileges of Parliament were like to be torn from them; but that he would rather venture his life

'than it should be so; and should rather to die a freeman, than live a slave.' Some pressed for the vote, and particularly the Earl of Roxburgh, who added, 'That, if there was no other way of obtaining so natural and undeniable a privilege of the Parliament, they would demand it with their swords in their hands.' Whether or no the Commissioner had information, that the House would adhere to what they proposed to be done, it is certain, that the Footguards were ordered to be in readiness, and that, for several days before, a grand-guard was set upon the Netherbow Port; and Lieutenant-general Ramsay was heard to say in his cups, 'That means would be found to make the Parliament calm enough.' However, the Commissioner, perceiving he should be torn in pieces, if he withstood the formidable opposition he saw against him, ordered the Chancellor to acquaint the House, 'That it was yielded the Parliament should proceed upon overtures for liberty next session.' Upon which assurance the Members met the next morning, in order to prepare an overture for their purpose, which was in substance as follows: 'That the elective Members should be chosen for every seat at the Michaelmas Head courts: That there should be a Parliament held once in two years at least: That the short adjournments de die in diem should be made by the Parliament themselves as in England: That no officer of the Army, Customs, or Excise, or gratuitous pensioner, should sit as an elective Member.' If such an act had received the Royal Assent, the Country-party had resolved in giving a supply; but the Commissioner was not instructed to purchase it at that rate; and, having notice of what passed, he called for such acts as he was empowered to pass, and, having given the Royal Assent to them, made the following speech to the Parliament:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

'We have now passed several good acts for our religion, liberty, and trade, which I hope, will be acceptable to all her Majesty's good subjects. I wish you had also given the supplies necessary for the maintaining of her Majesty's forces, and preserving the peace and safety of the Kingdom. But since, I hope, this may yet be done in due time, and that besides some questions and difficulties are fallen, that, in all probability, you can have no time to determine; and that withal, it is fit her Majesty should have time to consider upon such things, that have been laid before her; and that, we may know her mind therein more perfectly, a short recess appears at present to be necessary, and that this Parliament be adjourned for some time. And therefore I have ordered my Lord Chancellor to adjourn this Parliament until the 12th of October next.' Which the Lord Chancellor did accordingly.

Besides his expulsion, he was voted incapable of ever sitting in any Parliament in Ireland.

The Commons pursued the Trustees of the forfeited estates still farther. For, in a representation of the state and grievances of the Nation, which they agreed to offer to the Queen, they begin with complaining, 'That whereas her Majesty's Royal Predecessors, of blessed memory, had always had the glory of being Kings and Queens of a free people, distinguished from the rest of Europe by the eminent privilege of being governed by their own laws, and of enjoying their liberties under the dominion of a Sovereign Prince, according to the most equal and just model of Government, that ever was framed; yet the Constitution of that Kingdom of Ireland had been of late greatly shaken, the lives, liberties, and estates of the subjects thereof being called in question, and tried in a manner unknown to their Ancestors. That when they considered the charge, which the subjects of that Kingdom had been unnecessarily put to by the late Trustees for the forfeited estates, in defending such their just rights and titles, as had, after many and expensive delays, been allowed by the said Trustees, had exceeded in

'value the current cash of that Kingdom; they had but too great reason to believe, that this had been principally occasioned through false and malicious reports and misrepresentations made of the Protestants of that Kingdom, by designing and ill-meaning men, in order to create a misunderstanding between England and Ireland, and to promote beneficial employments for themselves.' (1).

The Commons offered the necessary supplies, and granted 150,000 l. to make good the deficiency of the necessary branches of the Establishment, for the support of the Government for two years, ending at Michaelmas 1705. But, though the Commons granted the supplies, they took exceptions to the accounts that were laid before them, and observed some errors in them. This begot an uneasiness in the Duke of Ormond; for, though he was generous, and above all fordid practices, yet, being a man of pleasure, he was much in the power of those who acted under him, and whose integrity was not so clear. A Committee having been appointed to inspect the public accounts, they had the thanks of the House, for saving the Kingdom 103,368 l. which by misrepresentation had been charged as a debt upon the nation, and were ordered to examine what persons were concerned in representing such a sum, over and above the funds granted by Parliament, and the revenue necessary to support the Government, and pay the public debts to Michaelmas 1703. The Commons likewise voted several pensions, amounting

(1) The rest of the representation was as follows:

'For, although her Majesty had been graciously pleased to assure them, that nothing of that kind had made any impression on her Majesty to their prejudice, yet they were very sensible, that that Nation had exceedingly suffered thereby in the opinion of England. That they could not, without the greatest grief of heart, reflect upon the great decay and loss of their trade. That the Kingdom being almost exhausted of its cash, and themselves hindered from earning their livelihood, and from maintaining their own manufactures, their poor were thereby become very numerous, especially the industrious Protestants, who, in a country, wherein the number and power of the Papists is very formidable, ought, as they humbly conceived, to be encouraged. That very many Protestant families had been constrained to remove out of that Kingdom, as well into Scotland, as to the Dominions of foreign Princes and States. That their foreign trade, and its returns, were under such restrictions and discouragements, as now to become in a manner unprofitable, although that Kingdom had of late, by its blood and treasure, contributed to save the Plantation-trade to the people of England. That the want of holding frequent Parliaments in Ireland had been a great encouragement to evil-minded men, who intended nothing but their own gain, though accompanied with the ruin and oppression of her Majesty's good subjects. That many Civil Officers were arrived at such a pitch of corruption, through hopes of impunity, as was almost insupportable, thereby getting vast estates in a short time in a poor country: That others, in considerable employments, dwelt and resided for the most part out of the Kingdom, thereby neglecting the personal attendance on their duty, whilst, in the mean time, their offices, (which in effect were made mere Sine Cures) were but indifferently executed, to the great detriment of her Majesty's good subjects, and the great failure

No. 39. Vol. III.

'of justice; so that they were fully convinced that nothing but frequent Parliaments, with permission for them to sit, and do the business of the Nation, could prevent, or reform so great and notorious abuses. That they offered to her Majesty's princely consideration this their most humble representation, with hearts full of a sense of their miserable condition, yet supported with the hopes they had from the auspicious reign of her most sacred Majesty; not doubting her Majesty's care and protection of them. For it was from her Majesty's gracious interposition alone in their favour, that they proposed to themselves relief from these their manifold groans and misfortunes. And that they could not despair of her goodness extended towards them in such a prudent and gracious manner, as might afford them relief, according to the exigencies of their condition, by restoring them to a full enjoyment of their Constitution, or by promoting a more firm and strict Union with her Majesty's subjects of England; which would be to the advantage of that Kingdom, nothing being a more certain truth, than that whatever riches Ireland can acquire, must at last necessarily center in the seat of the Government.' Concluding with these wishes: 'May the choicest blessings of the great Creator and Preserver of all things constantly attend your most sacred Majesty: May you long continue to be the choicest blessing of your people, and the afterer of the Liberties of Europe: And may we, your poor subjects of Ireland, be an eminent instance of your Majesty's having a just right to that most glorious title, that we may heartily join with the rest of mankind in proclaiming, that your most excellent Majesty is not only the greatest, but the best and justest Princes, that ever reigned.'

On the 25th of October, Mr Southwell, Secretary of State, acquainted the House of Commons, 'That their representation was a matter of the highest consequence; and that his Grace would take such care of it as might most conduce to the service of the Nation.'

1703. mounting to above 17000 l. a year, to be unnecessary branches of the Establishment, and voted a provision for all the half-pay Officers (1). They enacted the Succession of the Crown to follow the pattern set them by England, in every particular, making it high-treason in Ireland, by word or writing, to impeach the Succession, as limited by several acts. But the great design of the Commons was, to break the power of Popery, and the interest, that the heads of the Irish families had among them. To this end they passed an act to prevent the growth of Popery; and, to make it the more solemn, the Speaker, attended by the House of Commons, presented a bill, on the 23d of November, to the Lord-Lieutenant, and made a speech on the occasion to the following effect: 'That they looked on this bill to be of such importance to their future well-being, that they had begged leave to attend his Grace in a body with it, and not send it, as in cases of less weight is usual, by particular Members. That the opposition constantly made in England by the Papists of Ireland, against whatever might tend to the security of her Majesty's Protestant subjects, induced the Commons to lay these heads of a bill in this solemn manner before his Grace. That they thought it now more particularly necessary, being well informed, and fully convinced, that great sums of money had been lately raised among them, to oppose the passing a bill of this nature in England; yet they doubted not, but the weight of the thing, and justice of their desires, would be so effectually laid before her Majesty by his Grace, that all obstacles would be surmounted, and an opportunity given them of assenting to the passing into law, what they conceived would be the greatest security to the Protestant Religion and Interest there' (2).

This bill to prevent the growth of Popery was somewhat like that, which had passed in England three years before*, but with some more effectual clauses, for the want of which no advantage had been received in England from that act. The main difference was that, which made it look less invidious, and yet was more effectual for breaking the dependence on the heads of families: For it was provided, that all estates should be equally divided among the children of Papists, notwithstanding any settlements to the contrary, unless the persons, on whom they were settled, qualified themselves by taking the oaths, and coming to the Communion of the Church. This seemed to carry no hardship to the family in general, and yet gave hopes of weakening that interest so considerably, that the bill was thus solemnly offered to the Duke of Ormond. Accordingly it was sent over to England warmly recommended by him; but it was as warmly opposed by those, who had a mind to have a share in the presents, that were ready to be made by the Papists, who had raised a considerable sum for that purpose. The pretence for opposing it was, that, while the Queen was so deeply engaged with the Emperor, and was interceding for favour to the Protestants in his Dominions, it seemed not seasonable, and was scarce decent, to pass so severe a law against those of his Religion. This pretence had the less strength, since it was very evident, that all the Irish Papists were in the French interest, and therefore there was no reason to apprehend, that the Emperor would be much concerned for them. The Parliament of England was sitting, when this bill came over, and people were very intent upon the issue of it, so that the Ministers judged it was not safe to deny it; but a clause was added, which they hoped would hinder its being accepted in Ireland. That matter was carried so secretly, that it was known to none, but those who were at the Council, till the news of it came from Ireland upon its being sent thither. The clause was to this purpose, That none in Ireland should be capable of any employment, or of being in the Magistracy in any City, who did not qualify themselves by receiving the Sacrament according to the test-act passed in England; which before this time had never been offered to the Irish Nation. It was hoped, that, on account of this clause, those in Ireland, who promoted it most, would now be the less fond of it, when they found it thus clogged. The greatest part of Ulster was possessed by the Scots, who adhered stiffly to their first education in Scotland; and they were so united in that way, that it was believed they could not find a sufficient number of men, who would qualify themselves, pursuant to this clause, to maintain the order and justice of the country. Yet, upon this occasion, the Irish Parliament proceeded

* See
p. 401.

(1) The first pension taken off was 1200 l. a year to the Presbyterian Ministers of Ulster granted by Patent from King Charles II. for their loyalty and good services to the Crown. Among the rest was a pension of 5000 l. to the Countess of Dorchester, King James II.'s mistress; another of 1600 l. during the life of the Earl of Rochester, to George Rodney Bridges; to the Duke of St Albans one of 800 l. and to the Lord St Albans another of 1642 l. most of the others had been granted to Papists, probably in consideration of some demands upon the grants of their estates. Among the pensions was reckoned that of the half-pay Officers of 2814 l. who were to be otherwise provided for. The whole of the pensions, voted unnecessary, amounted to just 17634 l. 0 s. 0 d. a year.

(2) At the same time was presented also a bill, to encourage the linen-manufacture, with an address to the Queen: Upon which bill the Speaker added, 'That they had also framed and agreed to heads of a bill for the improvement of the linen-manufacture, which they conceived might in time become useful

' to that Kingdom, if liberty should be given them ' to transport the linen-manufactures thereof directly to the Plantations, but would otherwise be destructive to the same. That, to obtain such liberty, ' they had framed an humble address to her Majesty, ' and relied on her great goodness to, and care of, her ' distressed people of that Kingdom, that her Majesty would be pleased graciously to interpose in ' their favour with the Parliament of England, that ' such freedom might be allowed them, as one of ' the encouragements they had been induced to believe they should have on their going into the linen ' trade, by the address of the Lords and Commons ' of England.' Which address they prayed his Grace to lay before her Majesty. Thereupon the Lord Lieutenant assured them, ' That he would ' take care to transmit these two bills, which were so ' much for the interest of the Nation, and recommend them in the most effectual manner, according ' to their desire, and do all that was in his power to ' prevent the growth of Popery.'

(1) Besides

1703. proceeded with great caution and wisdom : They reckoned, that this act, so far as it related to Papists, would have a certain and great effect for their common security ; and that, when it was once passed, it would never be repealed ; whereas, if great inconveniencies did arise to the Protestant Dissenters upon this new clause, it would be an easier thing to obtain a repeal of it in a subsequent Parliament, either of England or Ireland. The act was therefore passed, and those, who thought they had managed the matter with a master-piece of cunning, were outwitted by an Irish Parliament. However this artifice, and some other things in the Duke of Ormond's conduct, put them into such an ill humour, that the supply was clogged and lessened by many clauses added to it.

On the 26th of November, the Irish House of Commons voted a book, printed and published by Brocas and Maloane, intitled, The Memoirs of the late King James II. &c. seditious, and ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, and Brocas the Printer, Maloane the Bookseller, and one Eustace, (who brought these Memoirs from England, and gave them to Maloane to print) to be prosecuted. It is remarkable, that, when the motion was made for burning the book, and prosecuting the Printer, a Member represented the great danger the Protestants were in, in some parts of Ireland, particularly in the County of Limerick, where the Irish were beginning to form themselves into bodies, and to plunder the Protestants of their arms and money ; adding, that the disaffected there held a correspondence with those in England, and were not out of hopes of restoring the pretended Prince of Wales. Whereupon the House resolved, ' That ' it appeared to them, that the Papists of that Kingdom still retained hopes of the coming ' in of the person, who went by the name of ' the Prince of Wales, in the life-time of the ' late King James, and now by the name of ' James III.' But the same day Mr Secretary Southwell, by command of the Lord Lieutenant, acquainted the House, that it was his Grace's pleasure, that they should adjourn till the 11th of January following, which was accordingly done (1). By this sudden adjournment, when the House was exerting itself with great zeal against Popery, the Session ended in so much heat, that it was thought the Parliament would meet no more, if the Duke of Ormond (who was severely reflected upon) was continued in the Government.

Thus the parts of the Government that were thought the most easily managed, Scotland and Ireland, had of late been put into so much disorder, that it might prove no easy work to set them again in order : The Government was every where going, as it were, out of joint : Its nerves and strength seemed to be much slackened : The trusting and employing, not only violent Tories, but even known Jacobites, as it brought a weakness on the management, so it raised a jealousy, that could not be easily cured. Stories were confidently vented, and by some easily believed, that the Queen was convinced of the wrong done her pretended Brother, and that she was willing to put affairs in the hands of persons, who favoured his Succession : It was also observed, that our Court kept too cold civilities with the House of Hanover, and did nothing that was tender or cordial looking that way : Nor were any employed, who had expressed a particular zeal for their interests. These things gave great jealousy : All that was said in excuse for trusting such persons, was, that it was fit once to try if good usage could soften them, and bring them entirely into the Queen's interests : And assurances were given, that, if, upon a trial, the effect hoped for did not follow, they should be again dismissed.

It is time now to turn to the operations of the war. The affairs at sea this year were ill designed, and worse executed. The making Prince George our Lord High-Admiral proved, in many instances, very unhappy to the Nation : Men of bad designs imposed on him, he understood those matters very little, and they sheltered themselves under his name, to which a great submission was paid ; but the complaints rose the higher for that : Our main fleet was ready to go out in May, but the Dutch fleet was not yet come over ; so Rooke was sent out, to alarm the coast of France ; he lingered long in port, pretending ill health ; upon that Churchill was sent to command the fleet ; but Rooke's health returned happily for him, or he thought fit to lay aside that pretence, and went to sea, where he continued a month ; but in such a station, as if his design had been to keep far from meeting the French fleet, which failed out at that time ; and to do the enemy no harm, not so much as to disturb their quiet, by coming near their coast : at last he returned, without having attempted any thing.

In March 1702-3, Vice-Admiral Graydon, a man brutal in his way, and not well affected to the present state of affairs, was sent to the West-Indies with a squadron of men of war, consisting of the Resolution, the Mountague, Nonfuch, and Blackwall, and several transports, with Brigadier Columbine's regiment, some store-ships and Merchant-men. The design was to gather all the forces, that were scattered throughout the Plantations, and with that strength to take Placentia, and drive the French out of the Newfoundland trade. But the secret of this was so ill kept, that it was commonly talked of before he sailed ; and the French had timely notice of it, and sent a greater force to defend the place, than he could bring together to attack it. He set sail from Plymouth, on the 13th of March, and, five days after, met with four French men of war under Monsieur du Cassé, sailing towards Brest, and visibly foul and in no condition to make any resistance. Captain Cleland,

(1) Besides the act mentioned, there passed

1. Act for an additional excise on beer, ale, and other liquors.

2. Act for encouraging the importation of iron and pipe-slaves.

3. Act to prevent Popish Priests coming into the Kingdom.

4. Act for securing the liberty of the subject, and for prevention of imprisonment beyond the seas.

5. Act for naturalizing all Protestant strangers.

1703. Cleland, who commanded the Mountague, engaged the sternmost for some time; but, upon his first firing, the Vice-Admiral made a signal to call him off, 'being under orders not to lose any time in this passage by chacing or speaking with any ships whatsoever, the contrary winds having kept him in Plymouth much longer than was intended, and the service, upon which he was bound, very much requiring his presence, and the regiment, that was with him.' Upon this the French men of war got safe into Brest. They were afterwards known to be Monsieur du Cassé's Squadron, which had escaped Benbue, about seven Months before, and was now bringing treasure home from Carthagena and other parts of the West-Indies, reported to be four millions of pieces of eight. But, tho' by this means a rich booty was lost, yet so careful was the Prince of Denmark's Council to excuse every thing done by a man of war of their own party, that they ordered an advertisement to be inserted in the Gazette, to justify Graydon; in which it was declared, that, in pursuance of his orders, he had not engaged the French Squadron. The orders were indeed strangely given; but the Admirals had never thought themselves so limited by them, but that, upon great occasions, they might stretch beyond their private instructions, especially where the advantage was visible, as it was in this case; for, since they were out of the way of new orders, and new occasions might happen, which could not be known when their orders were given, the nature of the service seemed to give them a greater liberty, than was fit to be allowed in the land service. When the Vice-Admiral came to the Plantations, he acted in so savage a manner, as if he had been sent rather to terrify than to protect them. When he had drawn the forces together, that were in the Plantations, he went to attack Placentia; but he found it so well defended, that he did not think fit so much as to make any attempt upon it. Thus this expedition ended very ingloriously, and many complaints of Graydon's conduct were sent after him.

After Sir George Rooke's fruitless cruise, it was resolved to send a strong fleet into the Mediterranean. This fleet was not ready till the end of June, and the orders were to come out of the Streights by the end of September. Every thing was so ill laid in this expedition, as if it had been intended that nothing should be done by it, besides the convoying our Merchant-ships, which did not require the fourth part of such a force. Sir Cloudesly Shovel was to command, who, when he saw his instructions, represented to the Ministry, that nothing could be expected from this voyage. However, he was ordered to go, and he obeyed his orders. He sailed from St Helen's, the 1st of July, with a fleet of thirty-five English, and seventeen Dutch men of war. He had under him the Vice-Admirals Fairborne* and Lake†, and Rear-Admiral Bing‡. The Dutch were commanded by Admiral Allemonde, with two other flags. They had a great number of Merchant-ships of both Nations under their convoy. The fleet appearing off Lisbon-Rock, the 24th of July, dispelled the fears of the Portuguese, of being insulted by a French Squadron. Sir Cloudesly Shovel sent Sir Stafford Fairborne to Lisbon, with compliments to the King of Portugal and the Queen-Dowager of 1703. England, by whom he was received with great marks of respect and esteem. After the fleet got through the Streights, on the 12th of August, and water began to be wanted, the Admiral having stretched over from Cape de Gat to Cape Hone, in Barbary, sent a boat with a flag of truce, to acquaint the Moors with his design of watering there; but they answered his message with a musket-shot, killed one of the boat's crew, and mortally wounded the Lieutenant of the Tartar, who commanded the boat, and died two days after. The want of water daily increasing, it was resolved in a Council of war to put into Altea on the coast of Valentia in Spain. The Eagle, commanded by the Lord Archibald Hamilton, and the Hampton Court, were sent before: But the Governor fired upon them with two guns planted on a Tower, which however were soon dismounted by these two men of war. In the mean time, the whole fleet came in sight of the place, on the 31st of August, and the Flamborough was sent close to the shore to cover the descent of the regiments of marines, who, to the number of two thousand five hundred men, landed under Brigadier Seymour without any manner of confusion, and were drawn up in order upon the shore, before half the fleet was come to their anchors. These land-forces formed a camp near the place, and a message was sent to the Governor, that they did not come as enemies, but friends; to which he answered, 'That he had a great esteem for the English; but, however, he was sorry, he was not in a condition to oppose their landing: That he would write to the Viceroy of Valentia, and if his orders were such, the Admiral must not take it ill, if he should fire upon his men.' At the same time the Admirals Shovel and Allemonde caused in their names a short Manifesto to be published and dispersed among the Spaniards, containing in substance, 'That, pursuant to the orders of her Majesty of Great-Britain and the States-General, they did not design to give the least disturbance to the good subjects of Spain, but to protect such of them, who, remembering their ancient obligations to the House of Austria, should swear allegiance to their lawful Monarch, the Archduke Charles, and endeavour to throw off the yoke of France. And, as they would give their assistance to those of the Spanish Nation, that should regard their duty and true interest; so they should destroy the persons, houses, and goods of such, as should oppose the efforts, which should be made for the deliverance of that valiant and glorious Nation from the tyranny and oppression of France.' This Manifesto had no other effect but that the Spaniards, seeing no injury was offered them, brought plenty of all refreshments and provisions, for which they were paid in ready money. They professed a great hatred to the French, appeared very well disposed to the House of Austria, and drank to the prosperity of the Archduke. The fleet being watered, sailed, on the 3d of September, for Leghorn, where they arrived on the 19th. Ten days before, Captain Jumper, with the Lenox, Ipswich, Hamphire, and Dover, sailed off Formontera, with the Turkey fleet under his convoy. As one design of this expedition was to endeavour to give some relief

Insurrec-

Cevennois
Hist. of Europe.
Cavalier's
Memoirs. The Cevennois, or inhabitants of the Cevennes, a mountainous country in the South-part of Languedoc in France, were mostly of the Reformed Religion, before the general persecution in the year 1685, to the violence of which they were obliged to yield; but most of them had since thrown off the yoke of Popery, and returned to their former faith, by means of some zealous Ministers; who, notwithstanding the danger, to which they exposed themselves, had constantly preached amongst them. Their numbers, and the advantageous situation of their Country, giving the Court of France more jealousy than of all the other Protestants in the Kingdom, care was taken to curb and oppose them more than any of the rest, and, by continual vexations, to put it out of their power to recover their Liberty. Monsieur de Basville, Intendant of Languedoc, and Count Broglio, Commander of the troops in that Province, left no means untried to ruin them, by their extortions and military executions. The Protestants assembling often in the woods to perform their religious exercises, those two Persecutors posted troops in several places, with orders to fire upon all such as they should find in those Assemblies, and to burn the Houses of those, whom they could not seize. By this means a great part of the Cevennois were entirely ruined, and whole villages laid waste. The Abbot of Cheilat, Sub-delegate of the Intendant Basville, was likewise very severe against those, who attempted to escape out of the Kingdom for Religion, having invented a rack to torment them, which was a beam slit in two with vices at each end. Every morning he used to send for his prisoners, in order to examine them; and, if they refused to confess what he desired, he caused their legs to be put into the slit of the beam, and squeezed them till the bones cracked, and tied their toes with strings, and turned them with wheels till they were out of joint. But Monsieur Esprit, one of the Preachers among the Protestants, having heard of these cruelties, marched at the head of about sixty young men to the Abbot's house, and demanded the prisoners. Upon his ordering the Guard to fire upon them, by which two of them were killed, and others wounded, they forced the Guard, broke open the prison, released the prisoners, and, having wounded the Abbot in the thigh, as he was making his escape out at a window, allowed him a quarter of an hour to prepare for death, then shot him dead, and set fire to his house. This done, they formed a design of greater importance, and going through the towns and villages, brandishing their swords, cried out, Liberty, Liberty; and, in a little time, drew a great many other young men after them, and formed a body of three or four hundred. The Attendant, being informed of what had happened to the Abbot of Cheilat, immediately sent orders for the seizing of the rioters; but, the troops, that were commanded upon that service, meeting with opposition, the Intendant thought this a favourable opportunity to enrich himself, by converting to his own use the pay of the troops, and quartering them at discretion upon the villages, where the murder had been committed; and, to carry on this scheme for his own profit the longer, he neglected to acquaint the French Court with this insurrection. The malecontents, having by this means gained time to strengthen themselves, increased to the number of two thousand, who divided themselves into four bodies, and became so formidable, that they began to make excursions into the plain, burnt Churches, and put to the sword the Popish Priests, and all their former Persecutors, leaving the rest unmolested. Upon this the Court of France dispatched Monsieur Julian, infamous for his Apostasy from the Protestant Religion, with eight regiments, to reduce the malecontents; but, these forces not being able to stem a torrent, which daily increased, Marshall de Montrevel was sent into Languedoc with an Army of ten or twelve thousand men, and directions to use all the methods he should think most effectual to quell the insurrection. The Marshall had not been long in Languedoc, before he published a declaration, whereby he committed all Priests, Ecclesiastics, and Churches, to the care of the new Converts and Communities; and declared, that, if any accident should befall them, the Communities should be answerable for them, and that they should be burnt and intirely destroyed. This impolitic declaration, together with several shocking cruelties exercised by that Commander, exasperated the malecontents, and increased their numbers, so that the French King's troops, after having been several times defeated, were obliged to keep within the walled towns. The repeated informations of the progress of the Cevennois, made the Sovereigns in alliance against France attentive to that insurrection; and the general concern, which the English Nation expressed for a people, who fought for the Protestant cause, together with the solicitations of the Marquis de Miremont, and other eminent French Refugees in their favour (1), moved the Queen, and Prince George, to propose the relieving of them in Council. The Earl of Nottingham assisted them.

(1) Colonel Cavallier in his Memoirs of the wars of the Cevennes, p. 172. tells us, that the Marquis wrote them a letter, wherein he observed, "That the Queen being informed of their deplorable condition, was resolved to send them some succours, and that he would come himself to help them; desiring them in the mean time to behave themselves with prudence till his arrival." Upon this they sent him an account of the state of their affairs, and in a short time after they received a second letter, which confirmed what he had written before; and afterwards sent them an express, called Flutar, to know what measure he could take to come and succour them. Having conferred together, they sent back the express with all the necessary instructions, who arrived safe in England, and gave the Queen an exact account of his journey; and they were assured by a third letter of speedy relief, which proved very prejudicial to them afterwards; for it was then they were beginning to get ground, and their remissness gave their enemies time to take measures to stop their progress: "I do not pretend," says Colonel Cavallier, to blame the Marquis's slowness; for I believe it was not his fault, he being much inclined to come and succour us; but, being unexperienced in such affairs, and under a necessity of taking advice, it was very difficult for him to know what to resolve upon. He had persons about him, who acted with more regard to 1703. tingham represented the dangerous consequence of afflicting rebels against their natural Prince; but the result of several consultations was, that, since all ways to relieve the Cevennois were shut up by land, the fleet, that was to go into the Mediterranean, under the command of Admiral Shovel, should endeavour to carry them a supply of arms, ammunition, and money: Which resolution was no sooner known, than universally applauded. And indeed, though it be neither lawful nor safe for Princes to encourage insurrections in one another's Dominions; yet this maxim cannot take place in time of war, when any way, by which the enemy can be annoyed, is allowable; nor, in particular, with regard to the French King, who at this very juncture, had armed part of the Empire against the Empire itself, and countenanced a design of an insurrection in Scotland, and other ill practices in England; which, in the Month of May, were discovered, by the seizing in Kent of two or three persons coming from France, and having about them several letters directed to Papists and disaffected persons.

The better to succeed in the enterprize of relieving the Cevennois, who were also called Camisars, several French Refugees were sent by land into France, to acquaint them, both with the Queen's good intentions, and with the signals, which the English ships would make, that they might answer them by other signals, and concur in the endeavours that should be used towards their relief. The only person, who had the good fortune, either to penetrate into, or return from the Cevennes, was Mr. David Flatan, who was sent by the Marquis de Miremont. The others were taken at the passage of Pont St. Esprit, and others broke alive upon the wheel, or made gally-slaves. Besides the persons sent by land to the Cevennois, there were three other French Refugees, Mr. Portales, Captain la Billiere, and Mr. Tennie, commissioned to go on board the English fleet, to assist in this undertaking, and be witnesses of all that passed. The first of these Gentlemen, being sent for to a Council of war of all the English and Dutch Flag-officers, held on board the Triumph, on the 29th of August, when the fleet was at Altea, wherein, among other things, it was debated, how to put that enterprize in execution, Sir Cloudesly Shovel told him, "That, the season being so far advanced, and the Gulphs of Narbonne and Lyons so dangerous, they did not think it prudence to hazard her Majesty's fleet in a coast unknown, and which had ever been so dreadful to the English seamen, that in order to avoid it, they often chose to go an hundred leagues out of their way: That he was very sorry he could not perform himself so great a service to the brave Cevennois; but that, pursuant to the result of their consultation, he would order two men of war to go upon that attempt, with a good quantity of arms, ammunition, and money; and that, if they had the good fortune to speak with their friends, and to deliver them those things, it would be easy for them to concert measures with the Cevennois for their farther supply and relief." Accordingly, the day Shovel sailed from Altea, he dispatched the Pembroke, Sept. 3. Captain Harris, and the Tartar, Captain Cooper, to enter the gulph of Narbonne, having the three Refugee Gentlemen on board, and two French Pilots besides. The next day they took a French Tartane, by the master of which they understood, that Marshall de Montrevel, having intelligence of their design, had already taken the necessary measures to disappoint it. The Pembroke and Tartar entered the gulph of Narbonne, and, being come between Port Ceste and Sept. 17. Pequai, they made the signals, as directed from Court under the Earl of Nottingham's own hand; but, not being answered from the shore, they did not think it safe to continue in that dangerous sea any longer, and so made the best of their way to the general rendezvous at Leghorn-road, where they arrived, the 23d of September, four days after the fleet (1)

Count Lamberg, the Imperial Ambassador at The Archduke proclaimed King of Spain Rome, came on board the Admiral in the road of Leghorn, on the 28th of September, and acquainted him with the Archduke of Austria's having been declared and proclaimed King of Spain at Vienna, by the name of Charles III. on the 12th of that month, N. S. Upon this every ship in the English Squadron fired fifteen guns, and his Catholic Majesty's health was drank. Count Lamberg having sent a Gentleman,

"their own interest than the public good. They talked of nothing in the Court of France but the great preparations England was making for our assistance, as if I should desire a man to take care of himself, that I had a mind to kill, and in the mean time bid him not be afraid; that I would do him no hurt. For all the projects of Monsieur Miremont were as well known in the Court of France as in England; and all this by means of the persons, whom the Marquis had chosen to be his advisers. This generally happens to Princes, who communicate their secrets to several persons. For the Court of France, being well informed of every thing, took such effectual measures, that it was impossible for us afterwards to have any correspondence with foreign Countries, so that all our hopes of the fair promises, the Marquis made us from the Queen, vanished after a delay of eighteen months. I believe it was not his fault, as I said before; for, had he been able to fly with ten thousand men to the place we were in, I am sure he would have no quarter to his relation's troop. The truth is, I believe France had then emissaries in England, as it usually has, which put a stop to the project of

"Monsieur Miremont, and prevented the Queen and her Allies from making use of so favourable an occasion to ruin France, which might have been effected in less than two years; for, being masters of the sea, they might easily have sent us succours, at least some arms and money. For, had they sent us but twenty thousand pounds Sterling, we would soon have made up a body of fifty thousand men. But, as I said before, they looked on this war as a sudden blaze, which soon vanishes away, and therefore neglected to send us any relief. It is wonderful how we could resist for so long a time twenty thousand men, and two Marshals of France. If the Reader will seriously consider the advantage the Allies had by our war, he will soon be persuaded, that, if the twenty thousand men, who were sent directly against us, had been employed, either in Italy, Germany, or Spain, they would have put a stop to the progress of the Allies, especially against his Royal Highness the Duke of Savoy, or in Spain against the Portuguese."

(1) The next morning after Sir Cloudesly's arrival, the town saluted him with five guns, of which he took no notice, as not being a sufficient salute for a Royal fleet.

1703. man, with one of Sir Cloudesly Shovel's Secretaries, to notify the Archduke's accession to the Spanish Throne to the Dutch Admiral Almonde, was somewhat surprized, that the Imperial Minister should not pay him a visit on that account, as he had done the English Admiral. However he ordered all his ships to fire also fifteen guns some hours after, and then Count Lamberg went to see him on board.

Burnet.

The arrival of the fleet at Leghorn seemed to be of great consequence, and the Allies began to take courage; but they were soon disappointed of their hopes, when they understood, that by Sir Cloudesly's orders he could only stay a few days there. Nor was it easy to imagine, what the design of so great an expedition could be, or why so much money was thrown away on such a project, which made us despised by our enemies, while it provoked our friends, who might justly think they could not depend upon such an Ally, who managed so great a force with so wretched a conduct, as neither to hurt their enemies, nor protect their friends by it. The fleet, pursuant to orders, sailed from Leghorn, the 2d of October. On the 6th, the Pembroke, Exeter, Tartar, Flamborough, and one fireship, were detached to go to Tunis and Tri-polis, to renew the peace with those Governments, and thence to proceed to Scanderoon to join Captain Jumper. On the 18th, Rear-Admiral Byng was sent with another squadron to Algiers, to renew the peace with that Regency; and, on the 12th, the fleet met with a dreadful storm, but did not suffer much damage, by reason it did not last long. Ten days after, Sir Cloudesly, with the remainder of the fleet, came into Altea-bay, where several Spaniards openly declared for Charles III. King of Spain, and offered themselves to serve on board the fleet, which was accepted. Having, on the 27th, passed the Straits-mouth, the Admiral ordered Sir Thomas Hardy, with the Bedford, Somerjet, and Lizard, to Tangier; and, on the 30th, the Dutch parted from the English, making the best of their way home. The same day Sir Cloudesly sent five ships under the command of Sir Andrew Lake to Lisbon, and thence to Oporto, Viana, &c. to take under his convoy those Merchant-ships, which were bound for England; and, having a fair wind, and good weather in his passage, arrived in the Douros on the 17th of November. The Orford, Warspight, and Lichfield, which parted from him six days before, met soon after with a French man of war of fifty-two guns and five hundred men, coming from Newfoundland, whom they engaged and took, after an obstinate fight of nine hours.

These fruitless as well as expensive sea-expeditions were not the only subject of complaint, with regard to the fleet. There were many other great complaints, particularly with respect to the victualling; many seamen were lost, who, as was said, were poisoned by ill food; and, though the victuallers were most complained of before the fleet went out, yet there was not such care taken to look into it, as a matter of that consequence deserved: The Merchants did also complain, that they were ill-served with convoys, and so little care had been taken of the Newcastle fleet, that the price of coals rose very high: It was also said, that there was not a due care had of our seamen, that were taken by the privateers; many of them died by reason of their ill usage, while others, to deliver themselves from that, went into the French service. Thus all our marine affairs were much out of order, and these disorders were charged on those, who had the conduct of them; every thing was unprosperous, and that will always be laid heavily on those, who are in the management of affairs: It is certain, that, in the beginning of this Reign, all those, who hated the late King and his Government, or had been dismissed the service by him, were sought out, and invited into employments; so it was not to be expected, that they could be faithful or cordial in the war against France. It is time now to turn to the operations at land.

When the Session of Parliament was at an end, the Court was wholly taken up with the preparations for the campaign. Just as the Duke of Marlborough was going abroad, he had a great domestic affliction, the loss of his only son, the Marquis of Blandford, a graceful person, and a very promising youth. He died, February 20, 1702-3, at Cambridge, of the small-pox. This, as may be imagined, touched his father very deeply, and delayed his passing the seas some days longer than he had intended. Upon his arrival on the other side, the Dutch brought their armies into the field, and it was resolved to begin the campaign with the siege of Benne. In the mean time, all men's eyes were turned towards Bavaria. The Court of Vienna had given it out all the winter, that they would bring such a force upon the Elector, as would quickly put an end to that war, and seize his whole country. But the slowness of that Court appeared on this, as it had done on all other occasions; for, though they brought two armies into the field, they were not able to deal with the Bavarian forces. On the contrary, the French having promised the Elector of Bavaria, in whom they reposed great confidence, such powerful reinforcements, as would effectually break all the measures of the Imperial Court; Marshal Villars, who lay with an army of thirty thousand men at Strasbourg, had orders to join the Elector. He passed the Rhine, and invested Fort Kehl, over-against Strasbourg (1), which was defended by a numerous garrison, but not well provided with ammunition fleet, and refused to accept the ordinary present, that was sent him by the Governor. The latter having sent to know the reason of it, Sir Cloudesly made him sensible of his mistake, and at the same time sent a message to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, insinuating upon a Royal salute, as having the Union-flag, the most considerable in England. After some disputes, his Royal Highness was obliged to order, that the town should salute with eleven guns, which was accordingly performed, and which Sir Cloudesly answered, and was afterwards complimented by several persons of distinction, and received the extraordinary presents, which had been prepared for the Count de Toulouse, Admiral of France, who was expected there before the English fleet, but who never durst come out of the harbour of Toulon, as long as the latter remained in the Mediterranean.

In pursuance of the articles, the garrison, consisting of two thousand four hundred men, were conducted to Philipsburgh.

Stirum defeats the Bavarians.

takes Newmark,

and Amberg.

These proceedings alarming the Councils of war at Vienna, Count Schlick was ordered to enter Bavaria on the side of Salzburg with one army, and Count Stirum, on the side of Newmark, with another. Stirum, having defeated a party of Bavarians, marched on to Newmark (1), where the Bavarian Governor, with a garrison of fourteen hundred men, made a shew of sustaining a siege; but, the Citizens seeing Count Stirum's batteries ready to play upon them, they mutinied against the Governor, and obliged him to surrender. Upon this, the City of Amberg (2) sent their Deputies to Count Stirum, offering whatever he could reasonably exact from them, provided he would forbear attacking their City. But that General refused to accept the Regency's offer; and, as soon as he had ordered the town to be summoned in the Emperor's name, he caused the place to be invested, which surrendered after a very short resistance.

On the other hand, Count Schlick, having drawn together an army of twenty thousand men in the Upper Austria, broke into the Bavarian lines by way of Salzburg, defeated the militia that guarded them, and made himself master of Riedt, and several other small places. To put a stop to these proceedings, the Elector of Bavaria assembled his army near Brenau, and (to deceive Count Schlick) reported, that he was going to besiege Passau. General Schlick, considering the importance of that place, advanced with the greatest part of his infantry to cover it, leaving his cavalry and all his artillery behind him. The Elector, being informed of these motions, passed over Scarding Bridge with twelve thousand men, and advanced towards the village Ipsbern, where the regiments of Schlick and Hanover were posted. He attacked them, and drove them to their main body, where they ranged themselves together in order of battle, resolving to receive the Elector, who, taking the advantage of his superiority, renewed the charge, and, after a bloody engagement, forced them to quit the field of battle, and pursued them as far as the country would permit. Immediately after this, the Elector being informed, that the head-quarters of the Saxon troops, with the artillery, were not above two leagues further, he directly marched towards them, and attacked them so vigorously, that they quitted their cannon, and at length were entirely defeated. In this action, the Imperialists lost seventeen or eighteen standards, four pieces of heavy cannon, four mortars, and all their ammunition and baggage. The Bavarians, in a few days after, took Newburg on the Imn, by capitulation, and the garrison was conducted to Passau.

Notwithstanding these disadvantages, General Schlick was resolved to penetrate into Bavaria; and, having overcome some of the enemy's troops, that guarded the woods and passes near Passau, he made himself master of Wiltzboven, and possessed himself of the country adjacent. Count Stirum was also in motion, and took Vryshadt, Newscassel, and several other small places in the Upper Palatinate. The Elector, observing the progress of that General, marched with a design to make himself master of Ratisbon. Upon that, the Count incamped between Newmark and Amberg, resolving to give the Elector battle the first opportunity. In order to this, he sent the young Prince of Brandenburg Anspach with eight hundred horse, to open the pass of Wiltz, which was guarded by the Bavarians. He very courageously effected the design, and dispossessed them of a very important post; but, being willing to pursue them, he was attacked by the Elector in person near Burghenfeldt, with a body of four thousand men, where, after making a glorious resistance for some hours, he was at last unfortunately wounded by a musket-shot, of which he died the next day, much lamented for his great bravery, and other extraordinary qualifications. The Imperialists hereupon thought fit to retreat, which was performed in very good order.

Though the Elector of Bavaria gave the most solemn assurances, that he would not leave the City and Dyet of Ratisbon (3), yet, contrary to all expectations, on the 6th of April, having taken up his quarters in the castle of Welks very near that City, and posted his army on both sides the river Danau, he gave notice by his Minister to the Director of Mentz, that he would have the bridge over the Danube, and the gate, which leads to it, delivered up to him, provided Count Stirum's declaration, that he would conform himself to the conclusion of the dyet, in not attempting to pass through the town, did not arrive in twenty-four hours. The next morning the dyet assembled, but, not immediately complying with his demands, he posted his army near St. Emeran's gate, where he began to raise a battery. The Burghers took up arms, planted their cannon upon the ramparts, and put themselves in a posture of defence.

It stands on the river Sultz, near the confines of Franconia, subject to the Elector of Bavaria, but taken by the Imperialists this present campaign. It stands twenty-one miles South-east of Nuremberg, and thirty-three North-west of Ratisbon.

(2) Amberg is a fine City of Germany, in the Circle and Upper Palatinate of Bavaria (or Nortgow) subject to the Elector of Bavaria, but taken by the Imperialists this campaign. It stands on the river Wills, thirty-two miles East of Nuremberg, and twenty-eight North of Ratisbon.

(3) Ratisbon is a very large, rich, and strong City of Germany, in the Circle and Dukedom of Bavaria. A Bishoprick under the Archbishop of Salzburg. It is free and Imperial, famous for the general dyets of the Empire; although it was seized by the Elector of Bavaria this campaign, he lost it (as well as his own dominions) in 1704, soon after the action of Schellenberg near Donauwert. It has a very fair stone-bridge over the Danube, one thousand and ninety-one feet long, and thirty-two feet broad, supported by pillars, and adorned with three towers. Here is also a magnificent old Cathedral, and stately Castle, where the Imperial dyets are commonly held.

But, the Bavarians advancing as far as the moat of the town, in order to bombard the place, the Cardinal and the other Ministers, thinking it not prudent to stay till the utmost extremity, desired, that they might treat with the Elector about the bridge the next morning; and, at the same time, the Burglers were expressly forbid to fire a gun upon the Bavarians, so that all things were quiet that night. At the time appointed, the Magistracy sent some of their own number to wait on the Elector, but were informed, that he not only demanded possession of the bridge, but that two battalions of his men should be admitted into the City, and that he allowed them but three hours to consider of it. This caused an extraordinary debate; but they, imagining that the City was not in a condition to make a long defence, and that they could not obtain any seasonable relief, at last agreed, that the bridge and gate should be delivered up to the Bavarians, which was done, on the 8th of April, at night. In return, the Elector signed an Instrument, whereby he obliged himself effectually to withdraw his battalions, as soon as the Emperor's ratification of the conclusion of the dyet for the neutrality of the City, and his General's declaration in that matter, should arrive; and, in the mean time, to leave all things in the same condition as he found them; and that the public Ministers, with their families, should enjoy all possible freedom and security. Having thus secured that post, he decamped with his army, and marched to oppose General Schlick, who, being informed thereof, quitted Wiltshoven, and retired to the woods, expecting a reinforcement of three thousand Hungarians, who were arrived in the Upper Austria.

Villars attacks the Imperial lines, and is repulsed. The Empire being thus in a declining condition, the French King sent positive orders to the Marshall de Villars to break through the Prince Lewis of Baden's lines at Stolhoffen, and join the Elector of Bavaria at all events; and Count Tallard was likewise commanded to reinforce him with his flying camp. Prince Lewis (the best part of whose army had been called away to the war in Bavaria) foreseeing the danger he was in, wrote a letter to the States-General, wherein he informed them, that he had neither men nor cannon sufficient to withstand so numerous an army, or to oppose so large an artillery, as Villars and Tallard were bringing against him. The States, upon this intelligence, immediately sent him a reinforcement of eight regiments, under the command of Major-General Geor; who, marching with all possible expedition, reached the lines at the same time that Villars appeared before them.

The French attacked the Prince with an army more than double his number; but his men, chiefly the Dutch battalions, received them with so much courage, that the French were obliged to retreat with great loss, and bent their march towards Offingen.

Villars, notwithstanding this unsuccessful attempt, upon repeated orders resolved not to abandon the Elector, who, after all his advantages, was like to be overpowered with numbers, if not timely relieved. The Black Forest was thought impracticable in that wet season. This was too much trusted to, so that the passes were ill guarded; and therefore Villars overcame all difficulties, and at last joined the Elector near Dulding. Upon this junction Count Stirum decamped, in order to march to Prince Lewis of Baden; but, being attacked near Schwemmingen, he retired under the cannon of Norlingen.

Whilst the French succeeded thus in Germany, Bonne the affairs of the Confederates upon the Lower Rhine, and in Flanders, were in a more prosperous situation. Rhinburg, which had been blockaded up by Count Leitum, General of the Prussian forces, surrendered. After this, Count Leitum blocked up Guedres; and the Duke of Marlborough caused Bonne (1) to be invested by the April 24.

Prussian and Lunenburgh cavalry, under Lieutenant-General Bouleau. The next day, General Fagel arrived with the foot; after him, the Duke of Marlborough and Baron Obdam; and the day following, Lieutenant-General Coeborn. The Generals, having held a Council of war, ordered the town to be attacked in three places; one was against the Fort on the other side of the Rhine, and the other two against the City and the outworks, that secured it. The first of these attacks was commanded by General Coeborn; the second by the Hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel; and the third by Lieutenant-General Fagel. Twelve regiments were ordered to each of these attacks, who took their posts accordingly. On the 3d of May, the trenches were opened in all the three attacks, and the Besiegers continued their approaches with extraordinary diligence and inconsiderable loss. On the 8th, the batteries being ready, the cannon and mortars played vigorously against the town and fort; and the same day the chain, which held the flying bridge (by means of which the fort communicated with the town) was broke by a cannon-shot, and the bridge carried away, notwithstanding the enemy used their utmost endeavours to save it with the loss of several men killed and wounded. But, in the evening, a very unhappy accident happened in Major-General Dedem's attack, where an hundred and fifty bombs, and as many grenades, took fire and were destroyed, together with a Lieutenant and five workmen. However the batteries at that attack, as well as those at the other two, began to play, on the 9th, in the morning; and, the Besiegers having intelligence that the garrison of that fort was not numerous, and the battery, which played upon it, making a very wide breach, they resolved to storm it in the evening, which was executed by four hundred grenadiers, supported by four battalions. During this attack, the enemy set fire to all the barracks and other buildings, that they might retire into the City by favour of the smoke; but most of them were so closely pursued into the 1703. the ravelin, that they had not time to effect their design. Some, who were taken prisoners upon this occasion, reported, that fifty men remained in a redoubt within the fort; whereupon the Besiegers immediately scaled the ramparts, and took that redoubt sword in hand after a short resistance; most of those, who defended it, being killed on the spot, and several made prisoners, as they were endeavouring to escape in a boat. The Commander of the fort and three other Officers were also taken prisoners, while on our side there were but three soldiers killed and five wounded.

The Confederates having thus made themselves masters of the fort, they soon after caused a new battery to be erected against the town of seventy pieces of heavy cannon and eighteen mortars, which began to play, on the 12th, in order to make two breaches, with a design to assault the place. On the 13th about noon, the Besieged, with about a thousand foot, supported by all their horse and dragoons, made a sally upon General Didem's attack, who at first were put into disorder; but, after some resistance, the enemy were repulied with the loss of about an hundred men killed, and as many wounded, besides a Major and three Captains taken prisoners; whereas the loss on the side of the Confederates did not amount to above half that number. All things being now ready for assaulting the first counterescarp on the Prince of Hesse's side, in order to make a lodgment, the attack was begun the same evening; and the Prince, being there in person, animated the soldiers with so much courage and resolution, that, in less than an hour's time, they drove the enemy from their works, and made their lodgment. In this action Major-General Tettau, who commanded, was wounded, with seven or eight inferior Officers, and one hundred and fifty soldiers killed and wounded, together with the Engineer, who commanded in the works. The next day, May the 14th, the Besiegers made such a terrible fire from their artillery, that, at three in the Afternoon, the Marquis d'Alegre, the Governor, caused a parley to be beat, and at six the hostages were exchanged. The next day, the Duke of Marlborough having agreed to the capitulation, it was signed and exchanged on the 16th, and three days after the garrison marched out, and were conducted to Luxemburg.

Whilst the greatest part of the Confederate army was employed at Bonne, the French King, reckoning that City would make a longer resistance, sent orders to the Marshals Boufflers and Villeroy to undertake the siege of the town and castle of Liège. But the Marquis d'Alegre having acquainted those Generals, that he could not defend Bonne many days longer, they made a motion towards Maastricht, pretending to surprise the Confederate troops, that were assembled there, and to bombard the town. So that, on the 5th of May, they advanced on a sudden into the Neighbourhood of Tongeren with an army of forty thousand men. The Confederates, 1703: who were marching with a design to have posted themselves in that place, were, upon this motion, obliged to retreat with speed under the cannon of Maastricht. In the mean time, the Tongeren enemy fell upon Tongeren (1), where the batra-^{taken by the} French, lions of Elliot and Portmore were quartered, who, having made a resistance of twenty-eight hours with extraordinary bravery, were forced at last to surrender at discretion. After this, the enemy advanced forwards, with a design to have forced the Confederate cavalry to repuls the Maeße at Nimeguen, and the foot to retire under the outworks of Maastricht, and there to have played upon them with their bombs; but, contrary to their expectations, they found the Confederate army drawn up in order of battle, under the command of Monsieur Overkirk, advantageously posted, and ready to receive them, though they were much superior in number. The two Marshals being frustrated in their designs, and having made several motions to no purpose, they thought it not proper to attack the Confederates, and so marched back the same way they came to Tongeren, leaving to Monsieur Overkirk all the honour of that day.

Soon after the surrender of Bonne, the Duke of Marlborough returned to the Confederate army in the Netherlands, consisting of a hundred and thirty squadrons, and fifty-nine battalions, and set forwards towards Liège, with a design, not only to secure that place, but to force the enemy to decamp from Tongeren, where they seemed to be very advantageously posted. This gave a new face to the affairs of the French army, and altered the plan of their designs; for the Allies having then a powerful army, being reinforced with the troops, that had formed the siege of Bonne, made several motions, in order oblige Villeroy to a battle, who constantly declined it: So that, on the 25th of May, the Duke of Marlborough having passed the river Jecker, advanced to Hautin, where the enemy intended to have foraged that morning; but, upon notice of the Confederates approach, they marched with great precipitation to Bochtewern, not thinking fit to stand the hazard of a battle. They likewise abandoned Tongeren, after they ^{who abandon it at} had blown up the walls and the tower. The Duke pursued them with all possible diligence, ^{the approach of} and advanced within half a league of their camp; ^{the Duke} and although the Jecker parted the two armies, ^{of Marlborough.} and the enemy had secured all the bridges and passes of the river, yet they imagined themselves not secure enough, but retreated to Hannuye, so that the Allies marched to Thys, and there incamped. The French drew up in order of battle, and sent away their baggage, as if they intended to have come to an engagement; but their courage failed them, and they immediately retired before the Confederates.

The French (after a sharp engagement) took it this campaign; but soon after abandoned it. It was here, that the Duke of Marlborough joined the army of the States, May 13, 1706, being just ten days before the glorious victory of Ramillies; to which the Confederates owe the reduction of the Netherlands. It stands on the river Jecker, eight miles almost West of Maastricht, and thirteen North-west of Liège.

1703. to command some troops, that were to act near Steken; and General Coeboorn, with another detachment, passed over the Scheld, to make an attack near Liefkenshoek; and General Obdam, with the rest of the army, staid on this side the Scheld, to make an attempt on the lines before Antwerp. The French had at that time two flying camps; one commanded by the Marquiss of Bedmar, and another about Bruges by Count de la Motte. Baron Spaar, on the 27th of June, in the morning, perceiving, that the Count observed him diligently, to deceive him, feigned a march towards Bruges; but, returning, advanced directly to the lines, and attacked them in the country of Waas near Steken; where, after a very bloody and obstinate dispute, he forced them sword in hand. Upon this occasion, twelve hundred men of Baron Spaar's detachment were killed and wounded, among whom were several Officers of distinction, particularly two Brigadier-Generals wounded, and Monsieur de Vassij, Governor of Sar-Van-Ghent, killed. Baron Spaar had also a slight wound, and his purse, which had only one pistole in it, saved his thigh. About the same time, General Coeboorn attacked the enemy's lines at the point of Callo, which were, after a short resistance, forced; the redoubt on the point of St. Anthony was also attacked, which the enemy seemed at first resolved to defend; but at last they surrendered at discretion.

The battle of Ecker-
en.

The forcing of the French lines occasioned no small joy at the Hague, and in the Confederate army, who imagined, that Antwerp would soon fall into their hands. For, on the 28th of June, at two in the morning, the troops commanded by General Obdam broke up, and marched towards Eckeren (1), which was intended for their head-quarters, with a design to shew themselves that day before the lines of Antwerp, to alarm the enemy on that side, and hinder them from sending any detachment over the bridge of Antwerp into Flanders. But their expectations soon vanished, upon receiving an account from General Obdam from Breda, wherein he acquainted the States-General, that the French had surrounded the body of the forces under his command, and, having marched from Lillo to Eckeren, had put them to a total rout; and that himself had made his escape to Breda with only thirty horse, and could give no further account of their army. This threw the States into a very great consternation; they met immediately, and after they had fate in consultation till one in the morning, dispatched away Monsieur Geldermanzen, with two Deputies more, with money and instructions, to prevent, as much as might be, the ill consequences of this supposed disaster. But these Commissioners, in their way towards the frontiers, met with a Courier dispatched by Monsieur Hop, Treasurer-General to the States, and their Deputy in that army, with a letter to the States, which they opened; and, finding in it a quite contrary account, they immediately returned to the Hague. It seems, after Obdam's flight, the Dutch rallied again, and maintained their ground with such firmness, that the French retired little to their honour; for, though they were much superior in number, yet they let the Dutch recover out of their first surprize, and keep their ground, though forsaken by their General.

Hop's account was, the next day, confirmed by another letter from Count Slangenburg to the States-General; both which agreed, in the main, with a relation printed by the French themselves at Namur. But though it is certain, that the loss was pretty equal on both sides, and amounted to about three thousand men killed and wounded on each; yet the French King was by his Flatterers persuaded, that his troops had gained the victory; upon which he caused Te Deum to be sung in the Cathedral Church of Paris. The pretence, which the French had for their triumph, was the flight of General Obdam; to excuse which, he wrote a letter to the States from Lillo, wherein he acknowledged, "That he made too hasty a judgment upon the imminent danger the whole army was in; and that the enemy, pressing on with an irresistible superiority, within pistol-shot of the place where he was present, and where no succour could come up to enable him to keep his ground, induced him to retire; adding, that he would have reassumed the command of the army, and that the Generals and other Officers made no scruple to obey his orders; but that, finding himself lessened in the general esteem, and looked upon as unworthy to command the forces of the States, he had begged leave of their Deputies to go to the Hague for a few days, in order to clear himself before their High Mightinesses, from the imputations he lay under." Accordingly, General Obdam arrived at the Hague; and shortly after, by command of the States-General, he delivered to them in writing his Apology for himself, which was much to the same purpose with his letter, and turned upon this distinction, "That he did not what he would have done, but the best he could do." On the 12th of August, several Officers of that army, which was now commanded by Slangenburg, wrote a letter to Obdam, importing, "That understanding there was a report in Holland, that since the accident, that befell him of being intercepted from the army at the battle of Eckeren, they had scrupled to serve under his orders, which was far from their thoughts; they therefore took a resolution to assure him, that they should be extremely glad to see him at the head of the army again." On the other hand, Marshal Boufflers's conduct, in this action, was likewise so much censured, that it was thought this finished his disgrace, for he was no more put at the head of the French armies. Nor was the Duke of Marborough without some share of censure on this occasion; since, it was pretended, that he ought to have sent a force to support Obdam, or have made an attempt upon Villeroi's army, when it was weakened by the detachment sent with Boufflers. But whoever

It lies six miles and a half almost East of Lisse, four miles North of Antwerp, twenty-three miles South South-west of Breda, and sixteen South South-east of Bergen-Op-Zoom.

1703. was in the fault; the States thought proper to cover the disgrace with rewards and thanks to the Officers and Soldiers, as well as to General Slangenburg; but, by reason of a misunderstanding, that arose on this occasion, between the Duke of Marlborough and that General, Slangenburg was dismissed, some time after, from his attendance on the camp.

The Allies, being willing to repair the disadvantages they sustained in the action at Eckeren, joined all their forces together, with a design to come to an engagement with Villeroy, who, in-camping near St. Jeb, gave out, that he resolved to stay there for the Duke of Marlborough. The Duke and General Overkirk, in expectation of this, marched with the army under their command to Hoogstraet, about half a league from the enemy's camp, who, to all appearance, made great preparation for a vigorous action. Slangenburg, decamping from Lillo, marched all night, and arrived early in the morning between Eckeren and Capelle to attack them on that side; and the Duke of Marlborough, with his army, advanced in a great plain over-against the enemy, and caused four pieces of cannon to be discharged for a signal to Slangenburg to begin the attack. But, as he advanced, Marshal Villeroy declined the engagement, and, having set fire to his camp, ordered his army to retire within their lines. The Duke, thus finding it impossible to bring the French to an engagement, marched with a considerable guard to view the enemy's lines; in which motion a detachment of the English Royal regiment of dragoons happened to fall in with one of the enemy's out-guards of forty horse, who, after one discharge, retired, and were chased by the English to the very barrier of their intrenchments; which afforded a very seasonable opportunity to the Confederate-Generals to have a perfect view of the enemy's lines. From that day the Duke of Marlborough laid a scheme to force the French lines; and accordingly, after having invested Huy (1), he held a grand Council of war, where the question in debate was, What would be most proper to be done, after Huy should be in their possession? The siege of Limburg being proposed, the Duke of Marlborough, and some other Generals, were of opinion; that attacking the enemy's lines between the Mesneigne and the Leuwe might be an enterprise, that would contribute much more to the glory and advantage of the Confederate arms. But this proposal, though supported by very strong reasons, was opposed by the Deputies of the States and the Dutch Generals, who would not consent to hazard their troops in an action, which, they said, was at best very dubious, and, if attended with success, would yield no further advantage, than to find the enemy retired into their fortified towns; whereas, on the contrary, should the French get the victory, the United Provinces would remain exposed to their incursions. Upon this the project for attacking their lines was laid aside, and a resolution taken to proceed to the siege of Limburg, as soon as Huy should surrender. Huy was taken three days after, and Limburg (2) was accordingly in-vested, which the Duke of Marlborough took, with no loss, but that of so much time as was necessary to bring up a train of artillery. For, having made a wide breach, the Confederates intended a general storm the next day, which the enemy perceiving, surrendered themselves prisoners of war to the number of one thousand four hundred men. Guel-ders, which had been blocked up by the Prussians, surrendered also, on the 17th of December.

After the taking these places, the Duke of Marlborough held daily consultations, and used all possible stratagems to bring them to a decisive battle; but they were contented to stand upon the defensive. Thus the Lower Rhine was secured, and all that Country, called the Cou-dras, was intirely reduced: This was all that our troops, in conjunction with the Dutch, could do in Flanders: We had the superior army, but what by reason of the cautious maxims of the States, what by reason of the factions among them, which were rising very high, between those, who had been of the late King's party, and were now for having a Captain-General, and those of the Lovestein party, who were for governing all by a deputation from the States, no great design could be undertaken by an army so much distracted.

In the Upper Rhine matters went much worse. Villars, after his junction with the Elector of Bavaria; lay for some time on the Danube, while the Elector marched into Tirol, and possessed himself of Innsbruck, the capital of that Country. The Emperor's forces were so broken into small armies, that he had not one good army any where. He had none in Tirol, and all that the Prince of Baden could do, was to watch Villars's motion; but he did not venture on attacking him, during this separation. Many blamed his conduct: Some called his courage, and others his fidelity in question; while many excused him, since his army was both weak, and ill furnished in all respects. The Duke of Vendome had orders to march from the Milanese to Tirol, there to join the Elector of Bavaria: Upon which junction, the ruin of the House of Austria would have probably followed: But the Boors in Tirol rose, and attacked the Elector with so much resolution, that he was forced to retire out of the Country with considerable loss, and was driven out before the Duke of Vendome could join him, so that he came too late. Vendome seemed to have a design on Trent, but the Boors were now so animated with their suc-cesses,

It was garrisoned by the French in 1702, and taken by the Confederate army under the Duke of Marlborough this campaign. It was re-taken by the French in 1705, and again re-possessed by the Confederates that same year, in whose hands it now continues. It stands on the river Maese, fourteen miles almost South of Liege, and seventeen almost North-east of Namur.

It is situated upon a rock, among shady woods on the river Wesdre, sixteen miles South-west of Aix la Chapelle, nineteen almost East of Liege, forty-three almost South-west of Cologne, fifty-four North of Luxemburg, and seventy almost East of Brussels.

Little done in Italy. Nothing passed this summer in Italy: The Imperialists were too weak, and too ill supplied from Germany, to be able to act offensively: And the miscarriage of the design upon Tirol lost the French so much time, that they undertook nothing, unless it were the siege of Ofaglia, in which they failed. The strong fortrefs of Barfello (1), after a long blockade, was forced to capitulate, and, by that means, the French possessed themselves of the Duke of Modena's Country.

The Elector of Bavaria having been thus forced to quit his acquisitions in Tirol, except Kuffstein, retired into his own Country, upon information that General Ravenstein had entered it by the way of Passau. Irritated at these disgraces, the Elector sent orders to General Santini to make himself absolute master of Ratibon, which, in great measure, was in his possession before. After this, to make himself amends for his ill success in Tirol, he resolved to seize the Imperial City of Augsburg (2), but was prevented by Prince Lewis of Baden, who, upon information of the Elector's design, marched with the utmost speed, and incamped near the City. Upon which the Bavarians divided themselves in two bodies, the Elector and Marshal Villars marching towards Donawert, and Count d'Arco, General of the Elector's forces, retreating over the Lech to Friedburg; which place was soon after surrendered to the Imperialists.

Battle between Stirum and d'Uffon. While these things were in agitation, Prince Lewis of Baden ordered Count Stirum to pass the Danube, and endeavour to oblige the Elector to quit an advantageous post, which he possessed upon the left. The Elector and Marshal Villars, having intelligence of Count Stirum's motions, resolved to attack him; and, to that end, sent to the Marquis d'Uffon, who was left in the camp at Lavingen, to come forth on a certain signal, and fall upon the Imperialists in the rear, whilst they charged them both in front and flank. The preliminaries to the action being thus adjusted, the Elector and the Marshal passed the Danube at Donawert, and, discharging six guns, were answered with two from the Marquis. Count Stirum, who knew the meaning of the signal, instantly marched and attacked the Marquis before the Elector and Marshal could come up. And, observing that the Marquis's horse were separated from the foot, he advanced with some select squadrons, and charged the enemy so well, that they were intirely broken and defeated, having lost twenty standards, and several hundreds slain. The Marquis d'Uffon, finding his cavalry totally defeated, marched with his foot with great precipitation to his camp at Lavingen, so that all his men were in danger of being either killed or taken prisoners, had not the Elector and Marshal come up seasonably, and charged the Imperialists at the same time. General Scuytemberg, Commander of the Saxons, stood the first shock with admirable bravery and resolution; but, a regiment of Bareith giving ground, and the enemy being much superior in number, Count Stirum retreated in good order to Nordlingen. The fight continued from six in the morning till four in the afternoon, when the French and Bavarians, being no less weary of an obstinate resistance, gave over the combat, and let the Imperialists march off without much molestation, who had lost in the battle, besides their cannon and baggage, above twelve thousand men.

The Imperialists, being thus employed in driving the Elector of Bavaria out of his dominions, and watching the motions of Villars, Count Tallard and the Duke of Burgundy projected the siege of Old Brisac (3), wherein Vauuban, the famous Engineer, assisted. Upon the 22d of August, N. S. at night, the line of circumvallation being finished, the trenches were opened, and the Besieged made a very vigorous defence, though with the loss of a considerable number of men. But, the Besiegers being provided with a train of an hundred pieces of cannon and thirty mortars, with plenty of all other materials, and the Confederates not having a sufficient number of men to attempt the relief of the place, the Governor thought fit to surrender it after a siege of fourteen or fifteen days. For which slender defence the Governor was condemned by a Council of war to be beheaded, and all the other Officers, who signed the capitulation, were punished.

The Duke of Burgundy, having left a numerous garrison to secure this conquest, returned triumphantly to Versailles; and, the Emperor's affairs being in a declining condition since Count Stirum's defeat, Tallard was ordered to besiege Landau *. The Confederates, knowing of what importance the preservation of that place would be to the common cause, ordered the Hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel to attempt the raising of the siege. He set forwards from the Neiberlands, and having joined the Count of Nassau Weilburg, General of the Palatine forces, near Spire, within four leagues of Landau, they concerted measures

(1) Barfello is a fortrefs of very good strength, in the Duchy of Reggio, and properly subject to the Duke of Modena. It received a German garrison in 1701, and stands at the confux of the Lenza and the Po, twenty-eight miles West of Mirandola, twenty-eight South-west of Mantua, and thirteen North of Reggio.

(2) Augsburg is a large, and one of the most celebrated Cities of Germany, adorned with magnificent Churches, Palaces, Magazines admirably well provided, and several excellent Hospitals. It is famous for several Imperial dyets that are usually held in it; and it was here, that the present King of the Romans was chosen and crowned, Anno 1689. The Elector of Bavaria in vain attempted the taking of it, in August 1703; but made himself master of it, the latter end of No. 40. Vol. III.

the same year. Though he was forced to abandon it, after the glorious battle of Hockstet, in August 1704. It stands on the river Lech by the borders of Bavaria.

(3) Brisac is a very considerable City and Castle of Germany, and esteemed one of the strongest places in Europe; whether its situation upon a high hill be considered, or what art has contributed to render it regular. The fortification is a French league in compass, the bastions are filled with earth, faced with brick, and secured by a large broad ditch full of water: And, it will require (in time of war) eight or ten thousand men to defend it. It stands on the river Rhine, twenty-six miles North of Basle, and thirty South of Strasbourg.

1703. measures for relieving the place. The French, having intelligence of their proceedings, ordered Monsieur Pracontal, with a body of ten thousand men, to follow the Prince with all possible expedition; and he was so diligent in his march, that he joined Marshal Tallard before the Confederates had any notice of it. All things being prepared to attack the French in their lines, Count Nassau came riding to the Prince of Hesse's quarters, and told him, that the enemy was very near, marching directly to attack him, and desired him to command the right wing to their arms. This was very surprising news to the Prince, because the Count had constantly assured him, that Tallard was not in a condition to come out of his lines. However he mounted immediately, and, observing that the Palatine Quarter master General had ranged the army in a very disadvantageous place, where they lay exposed in flank to the enemy, he dispatched his Aid-de-camp to the Count, to desire him to march slowly, that he might join him with his right wing. But, before the messenger could return, Count Nassau had engaged the enemy, and at first had the advantage; but the enemy, renewing the charge, fell on with so much fury upon the foot, that they were forced to retire in great disorder, before the right wing, commanded by the Prince of Hesse, could come up to their relief. By this means, the left wing being in great confusion, the enemy poured all their force upon the right wing, which was defended for some time with a great deal of bravery. But, the defeat of the left having opened a way for the enemy to attack the Hessian foot in front and flank, they were forced to retreat, after an obstinate and bloody resistance, which continued from one in the afternoon till night. The Prince of Hesse, during the whole action, performed all that could be expected from a brave and experienced Commander, having three horses killed under him, and slew a French Officer with his own hand. In this action several persons of distinction fell on both sides, particularly Monsieur Pracontal, who commanded the French, besides some thousands of private men. But that, which was the greatest consequence of this victory, was the enemy's returning to the camp before Landau, where the Count de Frize, Governor of the place, despairing of any farther relief, surrendered that important fortress upon the same conditions, that were granted the year before to Monsieur de Melac, the French Governor. The enemy valued themselves very much upon the success both of the battle and the siege; and Count Tallard could not have concluded the campaign with more glory on the French side, and with greater disgrace to the Allies, whose Officers were many of them drinking and celebrating the Emperor's birth-day at Spire, when the enemy unexpectedly surprized them, which unfortunately occasioned the loss of the battle, and the surrender of the town.

Ausburg taken by the Elector of Bavaria.

There was nothing more this year very remarkable in Germany, but the taking of Ausburg by the Elector of Bavaria, which was invested on the 6th of December. During the siege, a letter, directed to General Bribrack, the Governor, was intercepted. The Elector, finding by the contents of it, that the Governor was advised to take such measures, as he should think most expedient for the preservation of the Garrison, and the City from being destroyed, 1703. but that there was no probability of his being relieved, sent the letter by the same messenger, from whom he had taken it, and ordered him, to let the Governor know, that if he did not immediately deliver up the place, he would lay it in ashes, and put all the garrison to the sword. Whereupon a capitulation was agreed on, and they were allowed to march out with four pieces of cannon, and other marks of honour, to be conducted to Nordlingen.

The Emperor's misfortunes were not occasioned alone by the junction of the French and Bavarians, but were heightened by an insurrection in Hungary, where Cardinal Calonitz and Eslerbasi had the Government intrusted chiefly with them. Calonitz was so cruel, and the other so ravenous, that the Hungarians took advantage of this distraction in the Emperor's affairs, to run together in great bodies, and in many places, setting Prince Ragotzki at their head. They demanded, that their grievances should be redressed, and their privileges restored. They were animated in this by the practices of the French and the Elector of Bavaria's Agents. Some small assistance was sent them by the way of Poland. They were encouraged to enter upon no treaty, but to unite and fortify themselves; assurances being given them, that no peace should be concluded, unless they were fully restored to all their ancient liberties.

The Court of Vienna was greatly alarmed at this, fearing it might be secretly set on by the Turks; though that Court gave all possible assurances, that they would maintain the peace of Carlowitz most religiously, and that they would in no fort encourage or assist the malecontents. A Revolution happening in the Ottoman Empire, in which a new Sultan was set up, raised fresh apprehensions of a breach on that side; but the Sultan renewed the assurances of maintaining the peace so solemnly that all those fears were soon dissipated. There was a great faction at the Emperor's Court, and among his Ministers; and it did not appear, that he had strength of genius enough to govern them. Count Mansfield was much suspected of being in the interests of France. The Prince of Baden and Prince Eugene both agreed in charging his conduct, though they differed almost in every thing else; yet Mansfield was so possessed of the Emperor's favour and confidence, that it was not easy to get him set aside. At last, he was advanced to an high post in the Emperor's Household, and Prince Eugene was made President of the Council of war.

During these proceedings, the French King had discovered the Duke of Savoy's inclinations of Savoy to the Confederacy. The Duke began to see his own danger, if the two Crowns of France and Spain should come to be united. He saw also, that, if the French King drove the Imperialists out of Italy, and became master of the Milanese, he must lie exposed to his mercy. His Alliance with France was only for one year, which he had renewed from year to year; so he offered now to enter into the Grand Alliance. His leaving the Allies, as he did in the former war*, shewed, that he maintained the character of his family, of changing sides, as often as he could expect better terms by the new turn; yet his interest lay so visibly now on the side of the Grand Alliance, that it was very reasonable

1703. to believe, he was resolved to adhere firmly to it. And therefore, all his demands were granted, as will hereafter appear. The Duke, having thus secretly agreed to enter into the Alliance, did not declare it, but continued still to deny it to the French, that, when the Duke of Vendôme should send back his troops at the end of the campaign, he might more safely own it. But his designs are said to be discovered by an intercepted letter. The French had reason to suspect a secret negotiation, but could not penetrate into it, so they took an effectual, though a very fraudulent method to discover it, which was told Bishop Burnet soon after by the Earl of Pembroke. They got the Elector of Bavaria to write to him, with all seeming sincerity, and with great secrecy, for he sent it to him by a subject of his own, so well disguised and directed, that the Duke of Savoy was imposed on by this management. In this letter, the Elector complained bitterly of the infolence and perfidiousness of the French, into whose hands he had put himself: He said, he saw his error now, when it was too late to see how he could correct it; yet, if the Duke of Savoy, who was almost in as bad a state as himself, would join with him, so that they might act by concert, they might yet not only recover themselves, but procure a happy peace to all the rest of Europe. The Duke of Savoy, mistrusting nothing, wrote him a frank answer, in which he owned his own designs, and encouraged the Elector to go on, and offered all offices of friendship on his behalf, with the rest of the Allies: The French, who knew by what ways the Savoyard was to return, seized him, without so much as acquainting the Elector with the discovery they had made. Upon this, the French King ordered the Duke of Vendôme to seize and disarm the troops of Savoy (being twenty-two thousand men) that were in his army; to demand withal the fortresses of Verceil, Verjur, and Susa, and other places; and, to insist, that the Duke of Savoy should reduce the number of his troops to the Establishment stipulated in the treaty of 1696, that his most Christian Majesty might secure the communication of his territories with those belonging to the Crown of Spain in Italy, and restrain the Duke of Savoy from giving him any disturbance. The Duke, provoked at these demands and insults, immediately commanded several French Officers, who happened then to be in Turin, and even the French Ambassador himself, to be put under confinement. That Minister, surprized at this order, arrogantly told the Captain of the guard, who was sent to seize him, "That the Duke being in the King his Master's pay, his Majesty might as lawfully, and of right, not only seize his forces, but also the person of the Duke himself, for his treachery." "That his Master would also be revenged, and not only harrahs him with a foreign war, but raise intestine broils in the heart of his dominions." These haughty expressions being reported by the Officer to the Duke, he went with him into his anti-chamber, which was crouded with Nobility and Gentry, and made him repeat these insulting words two or three times. The whole Court resented the affront to that degree, that they unanimously promised to live and die with their Sovereign. On the other hand, the French King ordered the Duke of Vendôme to invade the frontiers of Savoy, 1703. and to send the following letter to the Duke:

S I R,

"S I N C E neither Religion, Honour, Interest, Alliances, nor even your own Handwriting, are of any force between us; I send my cousin, the Duke of Vendôme, at the head of my armies, to make known to you my intentions. He will allow you but four and twenty hours to resolve what you have to do."

The Duke of Savoy remained unmoved by this menacing letter, which he soon after answered by a Manifesto against France. In the mean time he sent the Count de Tarini to Vienno, with the treaty concluded between him and Count d'Aversberg, (who was come to Turin incognito for that purpose) and, having acknowledged the Archduke as King of Spain by the name of Charles III, gave notice of all his proceedings to the Queen of Great-Britain and the States of the United-Provinces; and soon after sent Envoys into England and Holland, to solicit the assistance of those two main supports of the Confederacy. Queen Anne, well knowing of what importance the Duke might prove towards the reducing the exorbitant power of France, immediately assured him of her friendship and protection; and, soon after, sent Mr. Hill to Turin, to concert measures with him against the common enemy. The States, to second the Queen's good intentions in favour of the Duke, dispatched Vandermeer to him; and both these Ministers set out together on their embassy.

Count Staremberg, being sensible of the disadvantages, which the Duke of Savoy must necessarily be under at this time, sent him a detachment of fifteen hundred horse, commanded by Visconti; who, notwithstanding all the diligence and secrecy he could use in his march, was attacked by a body of the French under the Duke of Vendôme, in the mountains of St. Sebastian; and, after a sharp engagement, escaped with the loss of his baggage, about a hundred and fifty men, and several horses. Soon after Staremberg himself (according to the positive orders he had received from the Imperial Court, to attempt a junction with the Duke of Savoy) began his march for Piedmont, with an army of fifteen thousand men from the Secchia through the enemy's country. This march is, by military men, said to be the best laid, and the best executed, of any in the whole war: He marched from the Modenes, in the worst season of the year, thro' ways that, by reason of the rains that had fallen, seemed impracticable, having in many places the French both before and behind him: He broke through all, and, in conclusion, joined the Duke of Savoy at Canelli, by which means the Duke was safe in Piedmont. The French King, perceiving that the breach between him and the Duke of Savoy was irreconcilable, resolved to declare war against him, which was accordingly published on the 4th of December.

Since the beginning of the war, all the Confederates had solicited the King of Portugal to enter into the Grand Alliance, as his own interest led him, it being evident, that, as soon as Remarkable march of Staremberg.

A treaty federates had solicited the King of Portugal to enter into the Grand Alliance, as his own interest led him, it being evident, that, as soon as 1703. Spain was once united to the Crown of France, he could not hope to continue long in Portugal. The Almirante of Castile was believed to be in the interests of the House of Austria; and therefore, to send him out of the way, he was appointed to go Ambassador to France. He seemed to undertake it, and made the necessary preparations; but he saw this embassy was intended for an exile, and that it put him in the power of his enemies. After he had therefore raised what was necessary to defray his expences, he secretly changed his course, and escaped with the wealth he had in his hands, to Lisbon, where he entered into secret negotiations with the King of Portugal and the Emperor; and gave great assurances of the good dispositions, in which both the People and Grantees of Spain were, who were grown weary of their new Masters. The risk, which he himself ran, seemed a very full credential. He affirmed, that the new King was despised, and the French about him universally hated; and that the Spaniards would not bear the being made a province, either to France or to the Emperor. He therefore proposed, that the Emperor and the King of the Romans should renounce all their pretensions, and transfer them to the Archduke, and declare him King of Spain; and that he should be immediately sent thither; for he assured them, that the Spaniards would not revolt from the King, who was in possession, till they saw another King, who claimed his right; and, in that case, they would think they had a right to adhere to the King they liked best. The King of Portugal likewise demanded an enlargement of his frontiers, and some new accessions to his Crown, which were reasonable, but could not be stipulated but by a King of Spain.

In the treaty, which the Emperor had made with King William and the States-General, one article was, that they should be at liberty to possess themselves of the Dominions, which the Crown of Spain had in the West-Indies; and he vested in them the right, which their arms should give them in these acquisitions: Upon which the King had designed to send a great fleet, with a land-army, into the Bay of Mexico, to seize some important places there, with a design of restoring them to the Crown of Spain, upon advantageous articles for a free trade, as soon as the Spaniards should receive a King of the House of Austria. This design was now laid aside, and the reason, which the Ministers gave for it, was, that the Almirante had assured them, that, if we possessed ourselves of any of the places in the West-Indies, the whole Nation would by that means become intirely French; they would never believe our promises of restoring them; and, seeing they had no naval power of their own to recover them, they would go into the French interest very cordially, as the only way left to recover these places. An intire credit was given to the Almirante; upon which 1703. Queen Anne and the States-General agreed to send over a great fleet, with a land-army of twelve thousand men, together with a great supply of money and arms, to Portugal; that King undertaking to have an army of twenty-eight thousand men ready to join them. In this treaty between the Emperor, the Queen of Great-Britain, the King of Portugal, and the States-General (which was signed at Lisbon, and brought to London on the 24th of May, and of which the ratifications passed the Great-Seal on the 14th of July) an incident happened, that had almost spoiled the whole. The King of Portugal insisted on demanding the flag, and the other respects to be paid by the English Admiral, when he was in his ports. The Earl of Nottingham declared, that it was a dishonour to England to strike even in another King's ports. This was not demanded of the fleet, which was sent to bring over Queen Katherine; so that, though Matbuen, the English Ambassador, had agreed to this article, he pressed the Queen not to ratify it. Matbuen, in his own justification, said, that he had consented to the article, because he saw it was insisted on so much, that no treaty could be concluded, unless that point were yielded. The low state of affairs in Portugal in the year 1662, when the protection of England was all they had in view for their preservation, made such a difference between that and the present time, that the one was not to be set up for a precedent to govern the other. Besides, even then, the matter was much contested in their Councils, though the extremities, to which they were reduced, made them yield it. The Lord Godolphin looked on this as too inconsiderable to be insisted upon; all the affairs of Europe seemed to turn upon this treaty, and so important a matter ought not to be retarded a day for such punctilio's, as a salute, or striking the flag; and it seemed reasonable, that every Sovereign should claim this acknowledgment, unless where it was otherwise stipulated by express treaties. The laying so much weight on such matters greatly heightened jealousies; and it was said, that the Earl of Nottingham and the Tories seemed to lay hold on every thing, that could obstruct the progress of the war, while the round proceeding of the Lord Godolphin reconciled many to him. The Queen confirmed the treaty, upon which the Court of Vienna was desired to do their part. But that Court proceeded with its ordinary slowness. The mildest censure passed on these delays was, that they proceeded from an unreasonable affectation of magnificence in the ceremony, which could not be performed soon nor easily in a poor but haughty Court. It was done at last, but so late in the year, that the new-declared King of Spain could not reach Holland before the end of October (1). A Squadron of our fleet under Sir

(1) In his journey from Vienna to the Hague, when he came to Dusseldorp, he was met by the Duke of Marlborough, who, in the name of the Queen, congratulated him on his Accession to the Spanish Crown. The King, having had notice of the Duke's coming, put on a fine rich sword, with which he presented his Grace in a very obliging manner; for, while they were both in discourse, his Majesty took it from his side, and, giving it into the Duke's hand with a graceful air, said in French, I am not ashamed to say, I am but a poor Prince. Je n'ay que la Cape & l'Epee, I have only my cloak, and my sword; the latter may be of use to your Grace, and I hope you will not think it the worse for my wearing it one day. The King arrived at the Hague the 3d of November.

1703. Sir George Rooke (who was appointed to conduct him to Lisbon) was lying there to bring him over, such as used to convoy King William, when he crossed the seas. But the Ministers of the King of Spain thought it was not strong enough, pretending, that they had advertisements, that the French had a stronger Squadron in Dunkirk, which might be sent out to intercept him, so that an additional strength was sent. This lost some time and a fair wind. It had like to have been more fatal, for, about the end of November, the weather grew very boisterous, and broke out, on the 27th, in the most violent storm, both by sea and land, that had ever been known in the memory of man. The City of London was so shaken with it, that people were generally afraid of being buried in the ruins of their houses, some of which fell and crushed their masters to death (1). Great hurt was done in the southern parts of England, little happening in the North, where the storm was not so violent. The best part of our navy was at that time upon the sea, which filled all people with great apprehensions of an irreparable loss. And indeed, if the storm had not been at its height at full flood and in a spring tide, the loss might have proved fatal to the Nation. It was so considerable, that fourteen or fifteen men of war were cast away, in which one thousand five hundred seamen perished. Few Merchant-men were lost; such as were driven to sea were safe; some few only were overset. Our Squadron, which was then in the Maele, suffered but little, and the ships were soon refitted, and ready to sail (2). The Parliament being then sitting, the Commons, on this dif-

In like manner was killed at Horley in Suffex, the Bishop of London’s sister, the Lady Penelope Nicholas. The damage in the City of London only was computed at near two millions; and at Bristol, at about two hundred thousand pounds.

(2) Sir Claudefly Shovel, just returned from the Mediterranean, was at anchor in the Gulf with two second rate, and six third rate men of war, four of which drove from their anchors, and were in the utmost danger. One of them, the Affliction, on board of which Sir Stafford Fairborne had his flag flying, got into Gottenburgh on the 11th of December. It fared much worse with the ships in the Dowms, where Rear-Admiral Beaumont, whose flag was flying in the Mary, perished with his own and several other ships.

The List of all that were lost there and elsewhere is as follows:

Vanguard, A second rate, ninety guns, six hundred and forty men, lost in Chatham harbour, no men nor guns aboard.

Northumberland, Captain Greenway, A third rate, four hundred and forty-six men, seventy guns, lost on the Goodwin-Sands, no men faved.

Sterling-Castle, Captain Johnson, A third rate, four hundred and forty-six men, seventy guns, lost on the Goodwin-Sands, sixty-three men faved, with the Captain, three Lieutenants, and Chaplain.

Restoration, Captain Emms, A third rate, four hundred and forty-six men, seventy guns, lost on the Goodwin-Sands, no men faved.

Mary, Rear-Admiral Beaumont, Captain Edward Hopson, A fourth rate, three hundred and forty-six men, sixty-four guns, lost on the Goodwin-Sands, Captain and Purser ashore, and but one man more faved.

Tork, Captain Smith, A fourth rate, three hundred and thirty-two men, sixty guns, lost at Harwich, all the men faved but four.

Newcastle, Captain Carter, A fourth rate, two hundred and seventy-four men, fifty-four guns, lost at Spithead, the Carpenter and twenty-three men more faved.

Reserve, Captain Anderson, A fourth rate, two hundred and twenty-six men, forty-eight guns, lost at Yarmouth, the Captain, Surgeon, and twenty-one more faved.

Litchfield Prize, Captain Chamberlain, A fifth rate, a hundred and fifty-five men, thirty-two guns, lost on the coast of Suffex, all the men faved.

Arundel, Captain Deering, A fifth rate, a hundred and forty-five men, thirty-two guns, lost at Bristol, all the men faved.

Mortar Bomb-Ship, Captain Raymond, A sixth rate, sixty-five men, twelve guns, lost on the Goodwin-Sands, all the men drowned.

Suffolk, Hospital, Captain Watkins, A sixth rate, eighty men, ten guns, lost at Bristol, all the men faved.

Eagle, Advice-Boat, Captain Bislock, A sixth rate, fifty-four men, ten guns, lost on the coast of Suffex, all the men faved.

Vesuvius, Fire-Ship, Captain Paddon, A sixth rate, forty-five men, eight guns, lost at Spithead, all the men faved.

1703. Queen's behaviour towards him was very noble and obliging. The young King charmed all who were present. He had a gravity beyond his age tempered with much modesty. His behaviour was in all points so exact, that there was not a circumstance in his whole deportment, that was liable to censure. He paid an extraordinary respect to the Queen, and yet maintained a due greatness in it. He had an art of seeming well pleased with every thing, without so much as smiling once all the while he was at Court, which was only three days. He spoke but little, and all he said was judicious and obliging. All possible haste was made in fitting out the fleet, so that he set sail in the beginning of January, and for five days he had a fair wind with good weather; but then the wind changed, and he was driven back to Portsmouth, where he lay above three weeks, and then he had a very prosperous navigation. The forces, which were ordered to go over to his assistance, were by this time got ready to attend on him, so that he sailed, on the 4th of January, with a great fleet, both of men of war and transport-ships. The fleet was commanded by Sir George Rooke, and the land-forces by the Duke of Schomberg, lately made Knight of the Garter. When they came within sixty leagues of Cape Finisterre, a violent storm ensued, which so damaged the ships, that Sir George was forced to return to Spithead. He could not fail again till the 12th of February, when the wind was so favourable, that in ten days the King of Spain happily arrived at Lisbon, where he was received with all the outward expressions of joy and welcome, and at an expence, in a vain magnificence, which that Court could not well bear; but a national vanity prevailed to carry this too far, by which other things, that were more necessary, were neglected. That Court was then very melancholy; for the young Infanta, whom the King of Spain was to have married, as had been agreed, died a few days before his arrival.

The affairs of Poland.
Burnet.

In Poland the scene was now more embroiled than ever. There was some appearance of peace this summer, but it went off in the winter. The old fierce Cardinal assembled a Dyet at Warsaw, wherein it was declared, that their King had broken all their laws. Upon which they, by a formal sentence, deposed him, and declared the Throne vacant. This was done in concert with the King of Sweden, who lay with his army at some distance from them in the neighbourhood of Dantzick, which alarmed the citizens extremely. It was believed, that the Dyet designed to chuse Sobieski, the eldest son of the late King, who then lived at Breslaw in Sillesia, and, being in the Emperor's Dominions, he thought himself safer than he proved to be. The King of Poland retired into Saxony in some haste, which made many conclude, that he resolved to abandon Poland; but he laid another design; which was executed to his mind, though in the sequel it proved not much to his advantage. Sobieski and his brother were in a correspondence with the party in Poland, that opposed King Augustus; upon which they ought to have looked to their own security with more precaution. But they seemed to apprehend nothing, where they then were, and so diverted themselves at hunting and otherwise in their usual manner. Upon this, some persons, sent by the King of Poland, took them both prisoners, and brought them to Dresden, where they were safely kept; and all the remonstrances, which the Emperor could make upon such an act of hostility, had no effect. This for some time broke their measures at Warsaw; many forsook them, while the King of Sweden seemed implacable in his opposition to King Augustus, whose chief confidence was in the Czar. It was suspected, that the French had a management in this matter; since it was certain, that, by the war in Poland, a great part of that force was diverted, which might otherwise have been engaged in the common cause of the Grand Alliance.

The Duke of Marlborough, at the end of the campaign in Flanders, returned to England, the 30th of October. The Queen and Prince, having been at the Bath seven weeks, came back to Windsor, the 9th of the same month.

Thus stood affairs both at home and abroad, when a new Session of Parliament was opened by the Queen, with the following speech:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I HAVE called you together as soon as I thought you could conveniently come out of your countries, that no time might be lost in making our preparations for carrying on the present war, in which I do not doubt of your cheerful concurrence, since you cannot but be sensible, that on the success of it depends our own safety and happiness, and that of all Europe.

"I hope I have improved the confidence you reposed in me, last year, to your satisfaction, and the advantage of Us and our Allies, by the treaty with the King of Portugal, and the declaration of the Duke of Savoy, which, in great measure, may be imputed to the cheerfulness, with which you supported me in this war, and the assurance, with which you trusted me in the conduct of it. And we cannot sufficiently acknowledge the goodness of Almighty God, who is pleased to afford us so fair a prospect, as we now have, of bringing it to a glorious and speedy conclusion.

"I must therefore desire you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, to grant me such supplies, as shall be requisite to defray the necessary charge of the war in the next year, with regard not only to all our former engagements, but particularly to our Alliance lately made with the King of Portugal, for recovering the Monarchy of Spain from the House of Bourbon, and restoring it to the House of Austria; which treaty, being in itself of the highest importance imaginable, and requiring all possible dispatch in the execution of it, has necessarily occasioned a great expence, even in this present year; though not so much as it will require, and for which, I hope, we shall be amply recompensed in the next.

"The subsidies, which will now be immediately required for the assistance of the Duke of Savoy, will likewise occasion a farther necessary charge.

"I must take notice to you, that no particular provision was made in the last Session, either for the charge of our present expedition to Portugal, or for that of the augmentation troops desired by the States-General; yet the funds given by Parliament have held out so well, and the produce of the prizes has proved so considerable,

1 rable,

1703. " rable, that you will find the public will not be " in debt by reason of either of these addi" tional services.

" I may further observe to you, that, though
" the funds for the Civil Government are dimi" nished by the War, I have, in conjunction " with the States-General, contributed out of " my own revenue towards some publick ser" vices, and particularly the support of the " Circle of Swabia, whose firm adherence to " the interest of the Allies, under the greatest " pressures, did very well deserve our seasonable " assistance. And I shall still be careful not to " engage myself in any unnecessary expence of " my own, that I may have the more to spare
" towards the ease of my subjects.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I heartily wish some easy and less charge" able method could be found out for the " speedy and effectual manning of the fleet.

" I must also recommend to you, to make " some regulation for preventing the excessive
" price of coals. I have examined this matter,
" and taken particular care to appoint convoys
" for that service; but the price has not been " in the least abated, notwithstanding a very " considerable quantity has been imported since " that time. This gives great ground of sus" picion, there may be a combination of some " persons to enrich themselves by a general " oppression of others, and particularly the " poor. It will deserve your consideration, how " to remedy this great inconvenience.

" And, in all your affairs, I must recommend
" as much dispatch, as the nature of them will " admit. This is necessary to make our pre" parations early; on which, in great measure,
" depends the good success of all our enter" prizes. I want words to express to you my " earnest desires of seeing all my subjects in " perfect peace and union among themselves.
" I have nothing so much at heart, as their " general welfare and happiness. Let me there" fore desire you all, that you would carefully
" avoid any heats or divisions, that may disap-" point me of that satisfaction, and give en" couragement to the common enemies of our " Church and State."

The conclusion of the Queen's speech, wherein she so strongly recommended peace and union to all her people, was understood as an intimation of her desire, that there should be no further proceeding in the bill against Occasional Conformity. Addressees, full of respect, were made to the Queen, in return to her speech. The Commons, indeed, to the Queen's earnest desire of union, said only, they would carefully avoid any heats or divisions, that might give encouragement to the common enemies of the Church and State: But the Lords, in their addressees, expressed themselves more fully, and assured her Majesty, in the most solemn manner, that, pursuant to her most earnest desire, they would not only avoid, but oppose whatever might tend to create any disquiet or dissension among her subjects. However, nothing could lay the heat of a party, which was wrought on by some who had designs that were to be denied or disguised, till a proper time for owning them should appear.
And therefore, notwithstanding the Queen (who had been informed that the Occasional bill had alarmed a great part of her subjects, who were otherwise well-affected to her Government, and no less able than zealous to assist her in carrying on the war) had endeavoured, by the warmest expressions, to dissuade the Parliament from this measure, yet that bill was again revived (1).
As this had been foreseen by the moderate party, Dr. Davenant (who now seemed to have forsaken his party, by the encouragement, and with the approbation of the Lord Hallifax, published a book, entitled, Essays upon peace at home and war abroad, wherein he enforced what her Majesty had lately recommended from the Throne; and endeavoured to bring all sorts of men to lay aside their heats and animosities, and to unite in their own defence, against the common danger, with design to dissuade the bringing in of the Occasional bill. At the same time Sir Humphry Mackworth published a small treatise, in defence of the proceedings of the Commons in relation to the Conformity bill; which pamphlet, however, contained little besides the arguments used a year before on the same subject. At length, about a fortnight after the meeting of the Parliament, a motion was made in the House of Commons, for bringing in a bill against Occasional Conformity.

(1) It is observable, that though the Queen had been prevailed with to express a desire, that the Parliament would avoid measures tending to create divisions (meaning the Occasional Conformity-bill) yet it appears, by the following letter, how much she leaned to the Tories, and even to those measures she would have dissuaded them from, and which she only thought unseasonable at that time.

Friday Morning,

" I give my dear Mrs. Freeman many thanks for " her long letter, and am truly sensible of the sincere
" kindness you express in it; and in return, to ease
" your mind, I must tell you, Mr. Bromley will be " disappointed, for the Prince does not intend to go to the " House, when the bill of Occasional Conformity is brought " in; but, at the same time, that I think him very " much in the right not to vote in it, I shall not have " the worse opinion of any of the Lords that are for " it; for, though I should have been very glad, it had " not been brought into the House of Commons, because I " would not have had any pretence given for quarrel-

" ling; I cannot help thinking, now it is as good as " past there, it will be better for the service to have it " pass the House of Lords too. I must own to you, " that I never cared to mention any thing on this sub" ject to you, because I knew you would not be of " my mind; but, since you have given me this occa" sion, I cannot forbear saying, that I see nothing like " persecution in this bill. You may think it is a notion " Lord Nottingham has put into my head, but upon my " word it is my own thought. I am in hopes I shall " have one look before you go to St. Albans, and " therefore will say no more now, but will answer " your letter more at large some other time; and on" ly promise, my dear Mrs. Freeman, faithfully, I " will read the book she sent me, and beg she would " never let difference of opinion hinder us from living " together, as we used to do. Nothing shall ever al" ter your poor, unfortunate, faithful Morley, who " will live and die, with all truth and tenderness,
" yours." Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough,
p. 154.

1703. sonal Conformity. Great opposition was made to it; the Court was against it; but it was carried by a great majority, that such a bill should be brought in. A new draught was accordingly formed. Though it was the same in substance, with the preamble, which was in the former bill, yet in several things it differed. The preamble against persecution for conscience only, was now left out. The former bill began with mentioning the act of indulgence, saying, That that act ought invariably to be observed; whereas, this takes not the least notice of it. This bill began with mentioning the Corporation and Test-acts, which it says, manifestly intended that all persons to be admitted into such offices and employments, should be, and always remain conformable to the Church of England, as by law established; which acts, it says, have been notoriously eluded, &c. And in the enacting part, whereas the former bill allowed but four besides the family where a conventicle was held, this allowed nine, and inflicted no punishment, unless there were ten or more, besides the family. The penalty in the former bill was one hundred and five pounds for every day that the persons concerned continued afterwards in office: But now it was brought down to a forfeiture of fifty pounds. There were also some other differences. These were artifices, by which it was hoped, upon such softening, to carry the bill on any terms; and when that point was gained, it would be easy afterwards to carry other bills of greater severity. There was now such a division upon this matter, that it was fairly debated in the House of Commons; whereas before it went there with such a torrent, that no opposition to it could be hearkened to. Those, who opposed the bill, went chiefly upon the ground, that the bill put the Dissenters in a worse condition than they were in before; and that it was a breach upon the Toleration, which ought not to be made, since they had not deserved it by any ill behaviour of their's, by which it could be pretended, that they had forfeited any of their benefits designed by that act. That things of this kind could have no effect, but to imbroil the Nation with new distractions, and to disgust persons well-affected to the Queen, and her Government. That it was necessary to continue the happy quiet, that the Nation now enjoyed, especially in this time of war, in which even the severest of persecutions made their stops, for fear of irritating ill humours too much. The old topics of hypocrisy, and of the danger the Church was in, were brought up again on behalf of the bill, which passed the Commons on the 7th of December, by a great majority, and was sent up to the House of Lords, where it occasioned a debate of many hours, whether the bill should be entertained or read a second time, or thrown out. The Prince of Denmark appeared no more for it, nor did he come to the House upon this occasion. Some who had voted for it in the former Session, kept out of the House; and others owned, that they saw farther into the design of the bill, and so voted against it. The Bishops were almost equally divided: There were two more against it than for it. Bishop Burnet distinguished himself by his speech against the Bill: He gave the Lords an account how the Test-act had been carried, and mentioned the many practices of the Papists, in order to set the Church against the Dissenters, and the Dissenters against the Church by turns, as it might serve their ends. 1703.

He ventured to say, that a man might lawfully communicate with a Church, which he thought had a worship and a doctrine uncorrupted, and yet communicate more frequently with a Church, which he thought more perfect; and that he himself had communicated with the Churches of Geneva and Holland, and yet at the same time communicated with the Church of England: So that, though the Dissenters were in a mistake as to their opinion, which was the more perfect Church, yet, allowing them a Toleration in that error, this practice might be justified. Several of the temporal Lords spoke also against the bill, particularly the Lord Heversham, the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Mohun, the Lord Ferrars, and the Lord Wharton. The last of these, to shew the unseasonableness of any thing, that led to persecuting their Protestant brethren, took notice of the distracted state of Scotland, and of the insolence of the Papists in Ireland; adding, that the House ought rather to imitate the Parliament of Ireland in their zeal against Popery, than to frame laws to increase divisions here. Nor did the Lord Mohun stick to say, "That if they" "passed this bill, they had as good tack the" "pretended Prince of Wales to it." Upon the whole matter, it was carried by a majority of twelve not to give it a second reading; but to reject it. The Clergy over England, who were generally inflamed in this matter, could hardly forgive the Queen and the Prince the coldness, which they expressed on this occasion. The Lord Godolphin did so positively declare, he thought the bill unseasonable, and had done all he could to hinder its being brought in, that, though he (as well as the Duke of Marlborough) not only voted for a second reading, but also entered their dissent against the rejecting it; the party were exasperated against him, and set up the Earl of Rochester, as the only man to be depended on, and who deserved to be the Prime Minister.

Notwithstanding these divisions, the Commons gave all the supplies that were necessary for carrying on the war. Some indeed tried to tack the bill against occasional Conformity to the bill of Supply; but they had not strength to carry it. On the 19th of November, Mr. Secretary Hedges laid before the House the copies of such treaties, as were not laid before them the last Session of Parliament, among which was the defensive and offensive treaty with Portugal. These treaties having been examined in a Committee of the whole House, it was resolved, on the 27th, "That the forty thousand men, which were raised to act in conjunction with the forces of the Allies, and the additional troops, consisting of ten thousand men, should be continued for the year 1704. That the proportion of land-forces, to act in conjunction with the forces of Portugal, should be eight thousand men, consisting of one thousand horse and dragoons, and seven thousand foot. And, that the sum of one million eight hundred one thousand and six pounds, fifteen shillings, be granted for maintaining these forces, and the guards and garrisons of this Kingdom, the payment of invalids, and discharging the subsidies payable to her Majesty's Allies." Two days before the Commons resolved, "That forty thousand 1703. "men, including five thousand marines, be employed for sea-service for the year 1704; "and that a sum of four pounds a man per month, for thirteen months, be allowed for maintaining the forty thousand men, including the Ordnance for sea-service." The last day of that month, Mr. Secretary Hedges acquainted the House, "That their address, relating to the continuance of the stop of all correspondence with France and Spain, having been presented to the Queen, her Majesty was pleased to answer, that she thought the continuance of the stop of all posts, letters, trade, and all other correspondence with the enemies, so necessary for the public good, that she would forthwith give orders to her Minister at the Hague, to insist upon it, with the States-General, as the Commons desired." The same day, the Commons voted an address to her Majesty, assuring her, That they would provide for the making good such Alliances, as she had made, or should make with the Duke of Savoy.
1 men

Barnet.

The seasonable discovery about this time of the ill designs of the Jacobites and French emissaries in Scotland, justified the Lord Wharton's taking notice, in his speech against the Occasional Conformity-bill, of the distracted state of that Kingdom. The Court of St. Germain's perceiving the divisions in Scotland, and the great opposition made in the Parliament of that Kingdom, had been encouraged to set all their Agents there at work, in order to engage both the chief of the Nobility, and the several Tribes in the Highlands, to be ready to appear for them. Simon Fraser of Beaufort, Lord Loval, had gone through the Highlands the year before, and from thence went to France, where he pretended, that he had authority from the Highlanders to undertake to bring together a body of twelve thousand men, if they might be assisted by some force, together with officers, arms, ammunition, and money from France. After he had delivered this message to the Queen at St. Germain's, she recommended him to the French Ministers, of whom he had some audiences. He proposed, that five thousand men should be sent from Dunkirk, to land near Dundee, with arms for twenty thousand men; and that five hundred should be sent from Brest, to seize on Fort William, which commanded the great pass in the Highlands. The French hearkened to all this, but would not venture much upon slight grounds, and therefore sent him back, with some others, in whom they confided more, to see how much they might depend on, and what the strength of the Highlanders was. They were also ordered to try, whether any of the great Nobility of that Kingdom would engage in the design. When these came over, Fraser got himself secretly introduced to the Duke of Queensberry, to whom he discovered all that had been already transacted; and undertook to discover the whole correspondence between St. Germain's and the Jacobites. He named also many of the Lords, who opposed the Duke most in Parliament, and said, that they were already deeply engaged. The Duke hearkened very willingly to all this, and gave him a pass to go through the Highlands again, where he found some were still very forward, but others were more reserved. At his return, he resolved to go back to France, and promised to make a more intire discovery. He put one letter into the Duke of Queensberry's hands, from the Queen at St. Germain's, directed on the back; but by another hand, to the Marquis of Atbol. The letter was writ in such general terms, that it might have been directed to any of the great Nobility; and probably he, who was trusted with it, had power given him to direct it to any, to whom he found it would be most acceptable; for there was nothing in the letter, that was particular to any one person or family; it only mentioned the promises and assurances sent to her by that Lord. This Fraser had been accused of a rape, committed on a sister of the Marquis of Atbol's, for which he was convicted and outlawed; so that it might be supposed, that he, to be revenged on the Marquis, who prosecuted him for that crime, might put his name on the back of the letter. It is certain, that the others, who were more trusted than Fraser, and were sent over with him, avoided his company, so that he was not made acquainted with that proceeding. He came up to London in winter, and had some meetings with the practising Jacobites about the town, to whom he discovered his negotiation. He continued still to persuade the Duke of Queensberry of his fidelity to him. His name was not told the Queen; for, when the Duke wrote to her an account of the discovery, he added, that, unless she commanded it, he had promised not to name the person, for he was to go back to St. Germain's to compleat the discovery. The Queen did not ask his name, but had more regard to what he said, because, in the main, it agreed with the intelligence, that her Ministers had from their spies at Paris. The Duke of Queensberry procured a pass for him to go to Holland, but by another name, for he opened no part of this matter to the Earl of Nottingham, who gave the pass. The Jacobites in London suspected Fraser's correspondence with the Duke of Queensberry, and gave advertisement to the Marquis of Atbol, and by this means the whole matter broke out. About this time Sir John Maclean, a Papist, and head of that Tribe or Clan in the Highlands, and western Isles of Scotland, came over from France in a little boat, and landed secretly at Folkstone in Kent. He brought his Lady with him, though she had been delivered of a child but eleven days before. He was taken, and sent up to London; and it seemed, by all circumstances, that he came over upon some important design. He pretended, at first, that he came only to go through England into Scotland, to take the benefit of the Queen's general pardon there. But, when he was told, that the pardon in Scotland was not a good warrant to come into England, and that it was high-treason to come from France without a pass, he was not willing to expose himself to the severity of the law, and was prevailed upon to give an account of all that he knew concerning the negotiations between France and Scotland. Some others were at the same time taken up upon his information, and some upon suspicion. Amongst those there was one Keith, whose uncle was trusted by the Court of St. Germain's, and whom they had sent over with Fraser, to bring them an account of the temper the Scots were in, upon which they might depend. Keith had been long at that Court; he had free access both to that Queen and the pretended Prince of Wales, and hoped 1703. hoped they would have made him under Secretary for Scotland. For some time he denied, that he knew any thing; but afterwards he confessed, that he was made acquainted with Frazer's transactions, and he undertook to deal with his uncle, to come and discover all he knew, and pretended there was no other design among them, but to lay matters so, that the Prince of Wales should reign after the Queen. Ferguson offered himself to make great discoveries; he said, that Frazer was employed by the Duke of Queensberry, to decoy some into a plot, which he had framed and intended to discover, as soon as he had drawn many into the guilt. He affirmed, that there was no plot among the Jacobites, who were glad to see one of the race of the Stuarts upon the Throne; and they designed, when the state of the war might dispose the Queen to a treaty with France, to get such terms given her, as King Stephen and King Henry VI. had, to reign during her life. When Bishop Burnet heard this, he recollected what the Marquis of Albion had said to him, soon after the Queen's Accession to the Crown; when, upon the Bishop's saying, That he hoped none in Scotland thought of the Prince of Wales; the Marquis answered, He knew of none, that thought of him, as long as the Queen lived. The Bishop replied, That, if any thought of him after that, he was sure the Queen would live no longer, than till they thought their designs for him were well laid. But the Marquis seemed to have no apprehensions of that. The Bishop immediately told the Queen this, without naming the person; and she answered him very quick, There was no manner of doubt of that. But, though the Bishop could not but reflect often on that discourse, yet, since it was said to him in confidence, he never spoke of it to any one person, during all the inquiry that was now on foot. Ferguson, ever since he had left the place, which had been given him at the Revolution, had been the boldest and most active man of the Jacobite party. He pretended, that he was now for High-Church, but many believed him a Papist. There was matter of treason sworn both against him and Keith, but there was only one witness to it.

At the same time Lindsay was taken up, who had been Under Secretary, first to the Earl of Melfort, and then to the Earl of Middleton. He had carried over from France the letters and orders, that gave rise to the Earl of Dundee's breaking off the year after the Revolution; and he had been much trusted at St. Germain's. He had a small estate in Scotland, and he pretended, that he took the benefit of the Queen's pardon, and had gone to Scotland to save his estate; and, being secured by this pardon, he thought he might come from Scotland into England; but he could pretend no colour for his coming to England; and, therefore, it was not doubted, but that he came hither to manage their correspondence and intrigues. He pretended, that he knew of no designs against the Queen and her Government; and that the Court of St. Germain's, and the Earl of Middleton in particular, had no design against her. But, when he was shewed Frazer's Commission to be a Colonel, signed by the pretended King, and countersigned Middleton, he seemed amazed at it;

He did not pretend it was a forgery, but he said, 1703. that things of that kind were never communicated to him.

At the same time, that these were taken up, others were seized on the coast of Suffex. One of these, Boucher, was a chief Officer in the Duke of Berwick's family, who was then going to Spain; but it was suspected, that this was a blind to cover his going to Scotland.

During the height of the debates about the bill against Occasional Conformity, the Earl of Scarborough produced a letter from his brother, acquainting him, that several suspected persons, retainers to the Duke of Berwick, were come over, and seized. Upon this the Earl of Nottingham, Secretary of State, told the House, "That this matter was already before the Queen, and would, in few days, be laid before both Houses." Nevertheless, the majority of Lords, either out of zeal for the safety of the Queen's Person and Government, or because they did not think it prudent to leave the inquiry into so important an affair in the hands of a person, whose affection to the Revolution Settlement had been questioned, resolved to appoint a Committee of seven of their own Members to examine into it, and ordered, that Sir John Maclean be brought to their House the next day. The Lord Steward having, on that day, acquainted the House, by her Majesty's command, "That the examination, relating to Sir John Maclean, was a matter of that nicety and great importance, that she thought it would be inconvenient to take it out of the method of examination it was now in, and that her Majesty would, in a short time, communicate it to the House," their Lordships acquiesced, and ordered the Lords, with the White Staves, to attend the Queen, to desire her, that Sir John Maclean might be committed to such safe custody, as that no person be permitted to speak to him without her leave, and that he neither write nor receive any letters or papers from any person, without the like permission from her Majesty: Which was complied with.

On the 17th of December, the Queen came to the House of Peers, and having passed the speech on all for a land-tax for the year 1704, made a speech to both Houses, wherein she acquainted them, "That she had unquestionable informations of very ill practices and designs carried on in Scotland by emissaries from France, which might have proved extremely dangerous to the peace of these Kingdoms; as they would see, by the particulars, which should be laid before them, as soon as the examinations could be fully perfected and made public without prejudice: And that, in the mean time, she doubted not but, by this seasonable discovery, she should be able to give such directions for their security as would effectually prevent any ill consequences from these pernicious designs."

The day following, the Lords proceeded by balloting to the choice of their select Committee; which fell on the Dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire, the Earls of Sunderland and Scarborough, and the Lords Sommers, Townſhend, and Wharton. Then the Lords, in an address, thanked the Queen for communicating to them her informations, of the practices of her enemies in Scotland;

1703. Scotland, and, the same day, the like address was presented also by the Commons.

Disputes between the two Houses in address to the Queen.
Dec. 23. The Commons, being in an ill humour against the Lords, were glad to find occasions to vent it. They thought the Lords appointing a select Committee, to examine the persons suspected, to be an incroachment on the Royal Prerogative, or, at least, a reflection on some of the Ministers, and therefore they presented the following address to the Queen:

Most gracious Sovereign,

"WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to lay before your Majesty the great and just concern we are under, to see any violation of your Royal Prerogative.

"Your faithful Commons believe the Administration of the Government best secured, when it is left to your Majesty, as the law has intrusted it; and have so firm a dependence upon your Majesty's affection to your people, and your great wisdom, that they can never apprehend so little danger from any conspiracy, as when the examination thereof is under your Majesty's direction.

"We are therefore surprized to find, that, when several persons, suspected of treasonable practices against your Majesty, were taken into custody by your Messengers, in order to be examined, the Lords, in violation to the known laws of the land, have wrested them out of your Majesty's hands; and, without your Majesty's leave or knowledge, in a most extraordinary manner, taken the examination of them solely to themselves, whereby a due inquiry into the evil practices and designs against your Majesty's Person and Government may, in great measure, be obstructed.

"Your Loyal Commons do therefore most earnestly desire your Majesty to suffer no diminution of that prerogative, which, during your Majesty's Reign, they are confident, will always be exerted for the good of your people.

"And we humbly beg leave to assure your Majesty, that, as we are resolved, by timely and effectual supplies, to enable your Majesty to carry on the war, which you have so gloriously begun; so we will, to the utmost of our power, support your Majesty in the exercise of your just prerogative at home, and the asserting of it against all invasions whatsoever."

In answer to which the Queen said, "That she had the satisfaction to find, that the matter, which might have occasioned this address, was now at an end: That she returned them many thanks for the concern they expressed for her prerogative, and for their repeated assurances of making the supplies effectual, which would be greatly for the honour and advantage of the Kingdom: And that she would be careful not to give way to any invasions of the prerogative of the Crown, or of the rights and liberties of the people."

The address of the Commons against the Lords was a proceeding without a precedent:

The Parliamentary method was, when one House was offended with any thing done in the other, conferences were demanded, in which matters were freely debated. But to begin an appeal to the Throne was new, and might be managed by an ill-designing Prince, so as to end in the subversion of the whole Constitution. And it was an amazing thing, to see an House of Commons affirm, in so public a manner, and so positively, that the Lords taking criminals into their own custody, in order to an examination, was without warrant or precedent, when there were so many instances fresh in every man's memory, especially since the time of the Popish plot, of precedents in both Houses, that went much farther, of which a full search had been made, and a long list of them read in the House of Lords. That did not a little confound those among them, who were believed to be in a secret correspondence with the House of Commons; they were forced to confess, that they saw the Lords had clear precedents to justify them in what they had done, of which they were in great doubt before.

It seemed surprizing to many, that the Commons, whose proper province it is to take care of the liberties of the subject should now appear such zealous assertors of the Royal prerogative, in opposition to the House of Lords, who are the natural Defenders of it. But this was intirely owing to a party-pique; the Tories, or High-Church-party, who were the strongest in the House of Commons, laying hold of all opportunities, both to ingratiate themselves with the Queen, and to oppose the Whigs, who had the majority in the House of Lords. Besides, the Tories received no small encouragement from some persons in high stations, who were ready enough to countenance those, who endeavoured to stifle the Scots conspiracy, which made the Whig Lords the more eager to examine into it.

The House of Lords highly resented the reflection cast upon them by the Commons in this address; and therefore, to vindicate their honour, and assert their privileges, they declared, "That, by the known laws and customs of Parliament, they had an undoubted right, whenever they conceive it to be for the safety of her Majesty and the Kingdom, to take examinations of persons charged with criminal matters, whether they be in custody or not; and to order, that persons to be examined be taken into custody of her Majesty's sworn Officer attending their House." And, four days after, they resolved, "That the address of the Commons is unparliamentary, groundless, without precedent, and highly injurious to the House of Peers, tending to interrupt the good correspondence between the two Houses, and create an ill opinion in her Majesty of the House of Peers, and of dangerous consequence to the Liberties of the People, the Constitution of the Kingdom, and Privileges of Parliament." This done, they presented, the next day, a Representation to the Queen, in which they complained of the ill usage they had met with from the House of Commons: They used none of those hard words, that were in the address made against them by the House of Commons, yet they justified every step they had taken, as founded on the 1703-4. the law and practice of Parliament, and no way contrary to the duty and respect they owed to the Queen. The behaviour of the Commons was such, on this occasion, as if they had no mind, that plots should be narrowly looked into. No House of Parliament, and, indeed, no Court of Justice, would take a person into custody without taking him into their own custody during such examination; and, if a person's being in custody must restrain an House of Parliament from examining him, here was a maxim laid down, by which bad Ministers might cover themselves from an inquiry into their ill practices, only by taking the persons, who could make discoveries, into custody. The Lords set forth the ill consequences, that might follow upon one House of Parliament carrying their complaints of another to the Throne, without taking first the proper method of conferences. This representation was drawn with the utmost force, as well as beauty and decency of stile, and was reckoned one of the best pieces of its kind, that were in all the records of Parliament.

The Queen in her answer declared, "That 1703-4 she was sorry for any misunderstandings, that happen between the two Houses of Parliament, which were so inconvenient for the public service, and so uneasy to her, that she could not but take notice with satisfaction of the assurance their Lordships gave her, that they would carefully avoid all occasion of them. She thanked them for the concern they expressed for the rights of the Crown, and for the protection of their liberties. She ver exert so willingly, as for the good of her subjects, and the protection of their liberties."

Boucher, when he was examined, would confess nothing; he said, he was weary of living so long out of his Country; and that, having made some attempt to obtain a pass, when that was denied him, he chose rather than to live always abroad, to come and cast himself upon the Queen's mercy; it did not seem reasonable to believe this; so the Lords made an address to the Queen, that he might have no hopes of pardon, till he was more sincere in his discoveries;

(1) It was in these words:

May it please your most excellent Majesty,

"We your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, find ourselves under an unhappy necessity of making this our humble application to the Throne, upon an occasion of an address presented to your Majesty by the House of Commons, the 23d day of December last, and since that time published to the whole Nation in print; by which the House of Lords is charged with the violation of your Royal prerogative, and of the known laws of the land, with wresting persons suspected of treasonable practices, and taken into custody by Messengers, out of your Majesty's hands without your leave or knowledge, and in a most extraordinary manner taking the examination of them solely to themselves, whereby a due inquiry into the evil practices and designs against your Majesty's Person and Government might in great measure be obstructed. And they conclude their address by most earnestly desiring your Majesty to suffer no damage to be done, and to be so disposed as to support you in the asserting it against all invasions whatsoever. It is not possible for us to remain silent under this heavy charge so unjustly, and without the least ground or colour, endeavoured to be fixed upon the whole body of the Peers, which, tending directly to create an ill opinion of us in your Majesty, puts us under an inevitable necessity of vindicating both the legality and dutiful manner of our proceeding."

"The expressions in the address of the House of Commons are so very harsh and indecent, that we may truly affirm the like never were used of the House of Peers in any age, not even by that assembly, which, under the name of the House of Commons, took upon them, not only to abolish the House of Lords, but to destroy the Monarchy. We shall carefully avoid making returns of that kind: We consider too much what we owe to ourselves, and we know too well the profound respect due to your Royal person, to let any provocation transport us so, as to use words unfit to be offered by us to our Sovereign."

"The matter of this address is no less injurious to us than the terms. There was not the least occasion for a just objection to any part of our conduct in that business, to which the address relates. The proceeding was strictly justifiable by the known laws and customs of Parliament: It was carried on with the utmost respect to your Majesty, and with true zeal for the safety of your Person and Government. All, that was done, was agreed to by the concurrent opinion of the House, without the least objection from any of our Members, who have the honour of serving your Majesty in your great offices and employments."

"We humbly represent to your Majesty, that, by the known laws and custom of Parliaments, the House of Peers has an undoubted right, in cases where they conceive it to be for the good and safety of your Majesty and the Kingdom, to take examinations of persons charged with criminal matters, whether such persons be then in custody or not; and also to order the persons so to be examined to be taken into custody of your Majesty's sworn Officers attending the House, during such examination, or to commit them to any other safe custody, that they shall think proper, and to restrain others, if they see cause, from having access to, or communication with, them. The House of Lords has exercised this right from time to time, as occasions have required, without objection. Our records are filled with precedents, which warrant our claim in every part of it; and we presume to affirm to your Majesty, that the drawing this right into question, at any time, cannot but be of dangerous consequence to the liberties and safety of the people, and to the constitution of the Government, as tending to avoid, or render in great measure ineffectual, the inquiries of Parliaments, which are so absolutely necessary, especially where many and great persons are engaged in dangerous designs against the Government, or where ill Ministers abuse their favour towards the oppressing or inflaming of the people. Your Majesty's wisdom and goodness make us secure at present against all influences of that kind; and we unanimously and heartily pray we may long enjoy the blessing of your Reign. But, if it happens in future time, that ill men should gain too great a degree of favour with our Princes, how easily will it be for them to stifle or defeat all Parliamentary inquiries into their crimes? For if the being in prison, or in the hands of a Messenger, will protect men from being examined in the House of Lords, or from being put into the custody of the proper Officers of the House, during the examination, and debarred from conversing with others; it will certainly be always in the power of favourites 1703-4. ries; and they prayed that he might be prosecuted on the statute: He confessed his crime, and was condemned, but continued still denying, that he knew any thing; few could believe this; yet there being no special matter laid against him, his case was to be pitied; he proved, that he had saved the lives of many prisoners, during the war of Ireland; and that, during the war in Flanders, he had been very careful of all English prisoners: When all this was laid before the Lords, they did not think fit to carry the matter farther; so he was reprieved, and that matter slept. He died at last in Newgate, without making any discovery, at least, that ever came to public knowledge.

Jan. 29. About the end of January, the Earl of Nottingham acquainted the House of Lords, "That "the Queen commanded him to lay before 1703-4. them the papers, which contained all the matters hitherto discovered of the conspiracy in Scotland; but that there was one thing, which he was also commanded to let their Lordships know, was not yet proper to be communicated to the House; because the making it public might prevent a farther discovery of matters of greater importance; but that their Lordships should be acquainted with this also, so soon as it could be done without prejudice to the public service." Upon this the Lords resolved to address her Majesty, "That the whole matter, and all papers relating to the Scots plot, might be laid before them, with all convenient dispatch, that this House might not want an opportunity, before

"to cause those, who can be witnesses against them, as well as the accomplices of their designs, to be taken into custody. And, if persons in custody are out of the reach of the House of Lords, who are the Hereditary Counsellors of the Crown, and in whom a judicial power is lodged by the Constitution, it is not to be imagined, that the Commons can pretend to a greater power of examining, committing, or restraining them.

"No House of Commons till now has given countenance to this dangerous opinion, which does so directly tend to the rendering ill Ministers safe from the examination of Parliaments. And we are persuaded no House of Commons hereafter will assert such a notion, because they are not wont easily to part with a power they have assumed; and it is certain, that they have several times taken upon them to exercise an authority like that, which they have so severely reflected on in their address.

"This consideration gave us the greater astonishment, to find our proceeding represented in the strange terms of wresting prisoners out of your Majesty's hands, and taking the examination of them solely to ourselves. We believe, the ordering persons to be examined in that High Court, where your Majesty is always present in consideration of law, and in that Great Council, where you may be present in your Royal person, as often as you please, will never be thought an exclusion of your Majesty from the examinations, if that was intended to be insinuated, by saying, we had taken the examinations solely to ourselves.

"Having thus laid before your Majesty what it is we claim, and must insist on, as the indisputable right of the House of Peers, which was never thought in the time of your Royal Ancestors to be prejudicial to the just prerogatives of the Crown, and which is manifestly necessary for the securing the liberties of your people, whereof we are assured your Majesty will have an equal care; we humbly beg leave to lay before you a short state of the particular matter of fact relating to these prisoners, not doubting, but, when the whole proceeding is known to your Majesty, it will be approved, not only as lawful, but every way respectful to your Majesty.

"On Tuesday, the 14th of December, the House of Lords was informed, that several persons had been seized by the Custom-House Officers on the coast of Suffex, as they came from France; and that amongst them there was one Boucher, who was capable of making considerable discoveries, having been in arms in the French service for many years, and Gentleman of the Horse and Aid-de-camp to the late Duke of Berwick, who stands attainted of high-treason, and who had been secretly in England several times before: That it was probable, if he was strictly examined, he might be brought to confess, since he saw his life in apparent danger; but that No. 41. Vol. III.

"he was a bold man, and likely to attempt an escape on that very account, if he was not carefully looked after. And the House was also told, that there was a general remissness both in the taking, searching, and looking to such prisoners, which did afterwards appear very evident in the examinations, that were taken. Upon this information the Earl of Nottingham, your Majesty's Principal Secretary of State, acquainted the House, that he had not heard of Boucher's name particularly, but had sent Messengers to bring one Ogilby, and the other prisoners, who had been apprehended by the Custom-House Officers, to town; and that he believed the Messengers would do their Duty, but he would not be answerable for them.

"After this account of the prisoners, and of what had been done in order to secure them, the House thought themselves obliged in duty to your Majesty, and for the public safety, at a time, when the Kingdom is engaged in an open war with France, and that there are too just grounds to apprehend the dangerous practices of French emissaries, to make an humble address to your Majesty, that particular care might be taken for securing the person of Boucher, and of those, who were taken with him; and that none might be suffered to speak with them till they were examined.

"The next day your Majesty's gracious answer to this address was reported to the House, that care had been taken to secure the prisoners; and that your Majesty would give orders, that no body should speak with them till they were examined. Thereupon the Lords entered into a farther consideration of the importance of this matter, and, conceiving nothing to be more likely to bring prisoners, who had forfeited their lives, to a full discovery of the truth, than to find themselves under the inquiry of a Parliament, they thought it would be of public service for them to take examinations of these persons; and accordingly an order was made, that no persons should speak with the prisoners, till they had appeared at the bar of the House.

"On the 16th day, the Earl of Nottingham informing the House of Lords, that the prisoners were brought to town, the Usher of the Black Rod was ordered to take them into his custody, in order to their examination, and to keep them separate and in close custody, as your Majesty had before directed. And, it being thought most proper, from the nature of the thing, that the examination should be by a Committee of Lords, rather than by the whole House, it was resolved accordingly.

"We beg leave to mention to your Majesty a matter of fact, which satisfied the Lords, that their resolution to take the examinations of Boucher, and the persons apprehended with him, was neither unknown nor disagreeable to your Majesty.

"On the same day, when that was ordered, being the 15th of December, the Lords resolved to examine mine

1703. "before the end of this Session, of enquiring "into, and discovering the wicked designs and "conspiracies of her enemies." To this ad-Feb 2. "dress, the Duke of Somerſet had been com"municated to them all the particulars relating "to the same. And the Duke of Somerſet had "vice, her Majesty did not expect that it "possible, that the state of it could be altered;
 "and that her Majesty made no doubt, but, be"fore the end of the Session, there would be a "proper time to communicate that which could "not now be made public without great incon"venience." Two days after, the Earl of Nottingham delivered to the Lords several other papers relating to the Sots conspiracy, which being sealed up as the former were, it was ordered, that all the papers should be opened, on Tuesday the 8th of February, and all the Lords summoned to attend.

By this time, all possible endeavours had been used to stifle the plot, and to prepossess the Queen and the Public, that the whole was a contrivance of the Duke of Queensberry, in order to ruin the Dukes of Hamilton and Arbol.
 The Duke of Arbol drew up a plausible memo-

r. 1

"mine Sir John Maclean, a very dangerous person,
 "as was represented to the House, who then stood "committed in the hands of a Messenger; and for "that purpose ordered him to be brought to the House
 "the next day, having, as they then thought, very "good grounds to believe it might prove of great ser"vice to your Majesty. Sir John Maclean was "brought to the House according to the order; but "your Majesty being pleased so far to take notice of "this order, as to signify to the House by the Lord-
 "Steward, that Sir John Maclean had been in part "examined already, and that your Majesty thought "it not proper to have that business taken out of "the way of examination it was then in, but that "your Majesty would in a short time communicate it "to the House; the Lords immediately acquiesced in "your Majesty's opinion, and sent back Sir John Maclean to the place from whence he was brought.
 "It was with this disposition of mind the Lords ac"ceded in this whole matter; and, if your Majesty, who "no doubt had the same notice of both orders, had "thought any other method of the examination of "Boucher, and the persons taken with him, more pro"per than of the Lords, they had reason to conclude
 "your Majesty would have intimated it at the same "time, and most certainly the House would have had "a like deference for your Royal judgment in that in"stance also.

"The Lords Committees appointed to examine the "prisoners proceeded with all possible dispatch, and "made their report to the House, on the 21st of "December. Upon consideration of the report, the "House found it requisite to commit Boucher to the "prison of Newgate for high-treason; and the Lords "Committees have submitted to the judgment of "the House, whether several parts of the examina"tions, referred to in their report, should be laid
 "open to the House, or put into any other way of "being farther inquired into or prosecuted; the "House, out of a full assurance they had, that, when "the matter of fact should be laid before your Ma"jesty, you would certainly give such orders there"upon, as were every way suitable to your Royal "prudence and tender care of the public safety, did "unanimously resolve, without so much as suffering
 "those parts of the report to be laid open to the "House, that an humble address should be made from "the House to your Majesty by the Lord-Steward
 "and the Duke of Somerſet (two of the Lords Com"mittees, to whom the examination had been refer"red) laying before your Majesty the whole report,
 "with all matters relating thereto, and humbly desir"ing your Majesty to give orders, that Boucher
 "should be prosecuted by Mr. Attorney-General for "high-treason; and that, as to the commitment,
 "prosecution, or discharge of the other prisoners,
 "mentioned in the report, you would be pleased to "give such directions, as should seem most proper to "your Royal wisdom. Thus as the whole affair was "entered upon out of our zeal for your Majesty's "preservation, and the safety of the Kingdom, and "was carried on and concluded with all possible re"spect to you; so we had the comfort to rest assured,

"that our behaviour was no less graciously accepted
 "by your Majesty, from the answer you were pleased "to make the same day to our last address on this sub"ject, and which was reported to us, on the 22d of "December, by the Duke of Somerſet, whereby your "Majesty was pleased to signify to the House with "your accustomed goodness, that you would give or"der for every thing, as the Lords had desired.

"Madam, This is a true and just account of our "proceedings, which have been so strangely misrepre"sented, and to which no exception can possibly be "taken by any persons rightly informed. For, as we "had your Royal approbation of all that was done,
 "so the House of Commons could have had no pre-
 "tence of objection, if they had taken the usual Par"liamentary methods of desiring to be informed of "what we had done, and of the grounds of our pro"ceedings, before they had approached your Majesty
 "with such a representation of them.

"Their carrying this unprecedented address to your "Majesty, in so hasty a manner, gives us almost as "great trouble as the hard usage we find by it.

"The ancient, known, and indeed only effectual "method of preserving a good correspondence be"tween the two Houses of Parliament, has been by "conferences. If at any time either House conceived
 "they had a reasonable ground to object against the "proceedings of the other, conferences have been de"fired, and the matter in debate between them fairly
 "discussed, and thereby mistakes have been cleared
 "for the most part, and a good understanding culti"vated, and a mutual respect preserved, which is al"ways highly requisite in the nature of our Consti"tution, but more especially in this time of war and "danger.

"Had the House of Commons thought fit to have "pursued this method upon this occasion, we should "have been able to have given them intire satisfac"tion, not only of the lawfulness of all we had done,
 "but of the just and weighty grounds, upon which "we took the examinations of these persons into our "own hands; or, at least, if they could have convin"ced us of any mistake, we should have given them
 "any reasonable satisfaction.

"But, without making any such previous step, the "House of Commons have made an appeal directly "to the Throne against the House of Lords, and "charged them, though most unjustly, with attempts
 "of the highest nature. Nothing like this was ever "done before; and, out of our hearty concern for the "preservation of our happy Constitution, we hope
 "the same thing will never be done again. We "know your Royal Heart is unmoveably fixed on pre"serving the liberties of your people, and transmit"ting them intire to posterity. But if in after-times
 "the Houses of Parliament should be appealing against "one another to the Crown (for, if such a course be "justifiable in the House of Commons, the same me"thod may be taken by the Lords) as your Majesty
 "is now sensible, how great difficulties it necessarily "brings upon a good Prince; so it is easy to foresee
 "(and we cannot think of it without terror) how fa"tal the consequences may be in the Reign of an ill-"designing

1703-4. rial for that purpose, which he read in the

Jan. 18. Scotch Council in the presence of the Queen (1). By this memorial it manifestly appeared, that the Duke of Arbol, though one of the principal persons suspected, had either the perusal or information from the Secretary of State, of the contents of the letters, declarations and examinations relating to the Scots conspiracy, before they were communicated to the House of Lords; a convincing circumstance, that the Accused were more countenanced than the Accusers: So that it was no difficult matter for them to put a slur upon the plot. There were two other circumstances which seemed to reflect on the Earl of Nottingham; his giving ear to the information of Ferguson, whom the suspected persons made use of, to clear them of the treason they were in danger of being charged with; and his discharging an Officer in King James's army, who had been seized by the Governor of Berwick. This being complained of in the House of Commons, a long debate ensued, which ended at last in a resolve, "That the Earl of Nottingham, one of her Majesty's "Principal Secretaries of State, for his great ability and diligence in the execution of his office, for his unquestionable fidelity to the Queen and her Government, and for his steady adhering to the Church of England, as by law established, had highly merited the trust her Majesty had reposed in him." The Commons, at the same time, ordered, that the Speaker should lay this resolution before her Majesty, when the said address should be presented to her: Which being done accordingly, the Queen was pleased to say, "That she was glad to find they were well satisfied with the Earl of Nottingham, who was trusted by her in so considerable a post."

The examinations of the prisoners being also sent to the House of Commons, they heard them read, but passed no judgment upon them, nor did they offer any advice to the Queen upon this occasion; they only sent them back to the Queen, with thanks for communicating them, and for her wisdom and care of the Nation: It was thought strange, to see a business of this nature treated so slightly, by a Body that had looked,

"designing Prince, and what advantages may be taken from it for utterly subverting the best-ordered form of Government in the world. There are examples abroad, where proceedings of this kind have ended in the overthrow of the liberties of the people, which makes us the more apprehend the beginning of them among ourselves. Your Majesty's great judgment cannot but readily discern, whither it does naturally tend for one House of Parliament to be exciting and earnestly desiring the Sovereign to exert a real or supposed prerogative against the other House. It is not easy to imagine, what the Commons could expect of your Majesty from such an application. The Lords have never entertained a thought of using this dangerous method, whatever occasions may have been given within the compass of late years. And we promise your Majesty, we will always endeavour to preserve a good understanding with the House of Commons, and shall never think it too dear to procure that union at any rate, unless that of delivering up those rights and powers, which are lodged in us by the law, and without which the Constitution cannot subsist.

"We shall never be guilty of the presumption of prescribing to your Majesty, when or against whom, you should exert your prerogative; but we will be always ready to assist you in the support of all the just rights of the Crown, as well as in the maintaining the liberties of the subject, which we know are no less dear to your Majesty.

"It may with modesty and truth be affirmed, that the Lords have in all times been the surest and most natural bulwark of the prerogatives of the Crown, they being (as your Royal Grandfather, of ever blessed memory, was pleased to express it) an excellent screen and bank between the Prince and the People, to assist each against any encroachment of the other.

"We will never contribute, by any act of ours, to the diminution of the rights of the Crown, nor, as far as we are able, will suffer it in others. We cannot act otherwise without hurting ourselves in the highest degree, being thoroughly convinced, that the preservation of the legal prerogative is not only the surest way to secure our own privileges, but of absolute necessity for the happy and rightful administration of the Government. And we hope, the House of Commons will, in all times to come, speak and act with that regard to the prerogative, which they seem to have taken up lately.

"There remains one particular more, which we will only name to your Majesty, because we rest

"satisfied, it cannot have any weight here, that is, the insinuation in the address, as if the examination of these prisoners by the Lords was in order to obstruct the inquiry into the designs against your Majesty's Person and Government; or, at least, that it was likely to produce such an effect. Our dutiful zeal for your Majesty's Government, and our warm concern to discover all designs, and oppose all practices against it, are too well known to the world, that any suggestions of that sort should make the least impression to our disadvantage; and, we are very sure, it was no suspicion of that nature, which gave the true rise to this very sharp address. It is easy to determine, whether a hearty and forward undertaking to search into the designs of your enemies, and the seeking occasions to object to and interrupt such endeavours, be most likely to obstruct the discovery of the pernicious practices of traitors.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We most humbly ask pardon for presuming to give your Majesty the trouble of this long representation, which has proceeded from the passionate concern we have to stand, not only acquitted, but intirely approved in the judgment of so excellent a Queen, and so justly beloved of all her subjects.

"We depend upon your justice, as well as your goodness, that nothing can do us prejudice, from whatsoever hand it comes, in your Royal opinion, while we continue to act in that station, where we are placed by the form of the English Government, according to the laws and customs of Parliament, with all imaginable respect and duty to yourself, and all possible zeal for the safety and happiness of your Kingdom.

"Give us leave to conclude this our humble address with this firm promise, that no danger, no reproaches, nor any artifices whatsoever, shall deter or divert us from using our utmost endeavours from time to time in discovering and opposing all contrivances and attempts, against your Royal Person and Government, and the Protestant Succession, as by law established."

(1) The substance of this memorial was as follows: That, on the 25th of November last, there was a discovery made to his Grace, that one Captain Simon Frazer, who was a declared rebel, outlawed in Scotland for a most barbarous rape, and other crimes, had been in London about a fortnight before; and that he had come from St. Germain's in May or June last; and, after having staid some time in London.

1703-4. looked, in former times, more carefully to things of this kind; especially, since it had appeared, in many instances, how dexterous the French were in raising distractions in their enemy's country: it was evident, that a negotiation was begun, and had been now carried on for some time, for an army that was to be sent from France to Scotland; upon this, which was the main of the discovery, it was very amazing to see, that the Commons neither offered the Queen any advice, nor gave her a vote of credit, for any extraordinary expence, in which the progress of that matter might engage her; a credit to given might have had a great effect, towards defeating the design, when it appeared 1703-4. how well the Queen was furnished to resist it: This coldness, in the House of Commons, gave great and just ground of suspicion, that those who had the chief credit there, did not act heartily, in order to the defeating all such plots, but were willing to let them go on, without check or opposition.

But the Lords, on the day appointed, resolved to take the plot into consideration, and examine the whole matter fully. They began with reading the papers laid before them, the most material of which was drawn up by the Earl of Nottingham, intitled, An account of the conspiracy

"London, had gone to Scotland, and there had met with the Duke of Queensberry at Edinburgh, at the time of the sitting of the Parliament; and, having got from the Duke of Queensberry a protection and pass, he, with them, travelled to several places in Scotland, particularly Argyleshire, where he produced the said pass, as also a Commission and Instructions signed by King James, and in this manner he seduced and trepanned several of her Majesty's subjects. That after this, and about the end of September, he returned to London, where he again met privately with the Duke of Queensberry, who procured a pass to the said Fraser, and three of his accomplices from the Earl of Nottingham, under false names. Upon which Fraser went to Holland in his way to St. Germain's, in order to give an account of his negotiations in Britain. That Mr. Robert Ferguson was the first, who, by a gentleman he sent to his Grace, informed the Duke of Athol of Captain Fraser's having been at London, and gone to St. Germain's with ill designs against her Majesty; and that the Duke of Queensberry intended by him and his accomplices to ruin him, the Duke of Athol, and several persons of Quality in Scotland. That on the 27th of November, the Earl of Nottingham acquainted his Grace, that the Duke of Queensberry having, by a note, desired a pass for four persons (viz. Captain Smeaton or Campbell, —Monro, —Dickson, and —Forbes) he had given the said pass. That thereupon the Duke of Athol waited on her Majesty, and acquainted her with what information he had got; and afterwards further informed the Earl of Nottingham, that the Duke of Queensberry had delivered the said pass to Colin Campbell of Glenderaul, an officer in the army in Scotland; and that he delivered it to Thomas Clarke, an Apothecary in Watling Street, at whose house Fraser had lodged, and who delivered it to him at Gravesend. That the deliveries of the said pass were confirmed by the examinations of Thomas Clarke and Colin Campbell. That on the 30th of November, his Grace acquainted the Earl of Nottingham, how the accomplices of Captain Fraser were to direct the letters from hence to him beyond sea, and how Fraser directed his letters to his correspondents here: Upon which several packets of letters were intercepted, which discovered Fraser's correspondents, particularly Colin Campbell, Mr. Keith, John Murray, and Captain Macleod, an Officer in the guards in Scotland. That, it appeared, that one Corlousien, a Merchant in London, had given a bill of one hundred and fifty guineas to Captain Fraser, and that Fraser had written to the Duke of Queensberry, under cover to Colin Campbell; and that there was also a letter intercepted from Fraser to the Earl of Leven. That, on the 6th of December Mr. Keith acquainted his Grace, that, the first time he met Captain Fraser in London, he desired him to try if the Duke of Athol would pardon the injury he had done his family, he being penitent, as he pretended. That, his Grace having inquired of Keith, why he did not acquaint his

"Grace with it sooner, he answered, That he knew it would be to no purpose for him to undertake such a message from Captain Fraser, whose design he believed was to trepan his Grace. And that Mr. Keith acquainted the Earls of Seafeld and Nottingham with what he had told his Grace. That, by the means of Colin Campbell and Mr. Clarke, were found several papers belonging to Fraser, and left by him before he went from London, particularly, a Commission for his being a Colonel, signed by the pretended King James. That by the declarations of Colin Campbell and Sir John Maclean, and others, and by Fraser's letters, it appears, that, besides the design of an invasion, there was another wicked contrivance, to bring several of her Majesty's good subjects and servants into a plot, in order to ruin them and their families. Wherefore his Grace humbly begged her Majesty would be pleased to order the Duke of Queensberry to give his reasons; 1. Why he met with, employed, and gave two hundred guineas to Captain Fraser in Scotland, with whom, as being an intercommuned Rebel, it was treason, by the law of that Kingdom, to converse. 2. How the Duke of Queensberry came to give a pass or protection to a Rebel, whose business in the Highlands of Scotland was to tempt her Majesty's subjects into a rebellion. 3. For what purpose the Duke of Queensberry sent Captain Fraser, and three persons with him, so carefully and privately to France, and what services he expected her Majesty would reap by their going thither, since it appeared by the letters and declarations, that Fraser's main design was to engage the French King to prosecute his design of an invasion." In a subsequent addition to this memorial, the Duke of Athol observed, in his own vindication, First, "That he saw by Fraser's letters, and the declarations of Colin Campbell of Glenderaul, and Captain Macleod, and by what a Lord had publicly said, that there had been a design to accuse his Grace, and several others, of corresponding with St. Germain's." Secondly, "That the said declarations were made by those, who were guilty of corresponding with Fraser, and who were employed by the Duke of Queensberry in his secret affairs with him." Thirdly, "That what these persons alledged was only upon a hear-say from Fraser, viz. that his Grace designed to send Glengary and Captain James Murray to St. Germain's, neither of which two persons his Grace ever spoke to. Concluding, that his Grace, as well as the Duke of Hamilton, were mentioned by Sir John Maclean, the last person, who came over from St. Germain's, and said, he had instructions to sound or try both their Graces: But that this was rather a vindication; for since they were to be founded, they were not engaged, or had correspondence there. By all which the world might judge of the rest of the malicious calumnies of his Grace's enemies, and how easy a matter it would be for his Grace to refute them, when public, especially the inconsistent story of a letter said to have been sent from St. Germain's to his Grace,"

1703-4. in Scotland. It was an abstract of all the examinations the Council had taken (1). Some took great exceptions at it, as drawn on design to make the affair appear more inconsiderable than they believed it to be. The substance of the whole was, that there went many messages between the Courts of St. Germain's and Verfailles, with relation to the affairs of Scotland; the Court of Verfailles was willing to send an army to Scotland, but they desired to be well assured of the assistance they might expect there; in order to which, some were sent over, according to what France had told the Duke of Queensberry; some of the papers were writ in gibberish, so the Lords moved, that a reward should be offered, to any who should decypher these. When the Lords asked the Earl of Nottingham, if every thing was laid before him, he answered, That there was only one particular kept from them; because they were in hopes of a discovery, that was like to be of more consequence than all the rest: So, after the delay of a few days, to see the issue of it, which was Keith's endeavours to persuade his uncle (who knew every step that had been made, in the whole progress of this affair) to come in and discover it, when they were told there was no more hope of that, the Lords ordered the Committee, which had examined Boucher, to examine into all these discoveries. Upon this the Commons, who expressed a great uneasiness at every step the Lords made in that matter, went with a new address to the Queen, insinuating on their former complaints, against the proceedings of the Lords, as a wresting the matter out of the Queen's hands, and the taking it wholly into their own; and they prayed the Queen to resume her prerogative, thus violated by the Lords, whose proceedings they affirmed to be without a precedent.

The seven Lords went on with their examinations, and, after some days, they made a report to the House; Maclean's confession was the main thing; it was full and particular; he named the persons that sat in the Council at St. Germain's; he said, the command was offered to the Duke of Berwick, which he declined to accept, till trial was made whether Duke Hamilton would accept of it, who, he thought, was the proper person; he told likewise, what directions had been sent to hinder the settling the Succession in Scotland; none of which particulars were in the paper, that the Earl of Nottingham had brought to the House of his confession. It was farther observed, that all the rest, whose examinations amounted to little, were obliged to write their own confessions, or, at least, to sign them: But Maclean had not done this; for, after he had delivered his confession by word of mouth to the Earl of Nottingham,

(1) This paper more at large was: "That the Earl of Nottingham had information of some designs of an insurrection in Scotland, to be supported with money, arms, and men from France, with which he acquainted the Queen, who, having received the like informations from the Duke of Queensberry, commanded him to communicate these matters to his Grace, that, by comparing them together, her Majesty might the better judge of them. This the Earl did, and the Duke said, that the accounts, which he had read, were much of the same kind; and added, that his informer was come from France, but his name he was obliged to conceal, and was so forward and zealous in doing service to her Majesty, that he was willing to go again into France, and to send from time to time, or even to bring intelligence of the further progress of the French designs, with which he was sure he should be trusted, as he had been formerly. That his Grace said, he accordingly designed to send him; which the Earl of Nottingham approved, and acquainted the Queen with this conversation with the Duke of Queensberry. That, on the 10th of November 1703, the Earl of Nottingham had an account, that Sir John Maclean, with others, were in custody at Falkstone, as coming out of France without leave; and that the same day he received a letter, as did also the Earl of Cromarty, from Sir John Maclean, intimating, that at his landing he had surrendered himself, and desired he might be brought before the Earl, to give an account of his coming. That, Sir John being accordingly sent for in custody, and examined, he said, That he had long desired to come home, and had often asked leave by his friends, without success; but now, hearing of the indemnity granted by the Queen to her Scottish subjects, he gladly laid hold of it, being weary of the hardships he endured in France, where he could not subsist with his allowance. That he never had any post, either in Court or Army; and he resolved to live quiet at home, in hopes of some favour from her Majesty, in consideration of the sufferings of his family for their loyalty. But being told, that, tho' this was a very specious representation of his case, yet it was No. 41. VOL. III.

"impossible to believe, that this was all, or the true design of his coming, since he had delayed coming many months after he knew of the indemnity; Sir John Maclean, upon this, pretended sickness, and that he now came in so much haste, that he brought his wife, who had lain-in but eleven days; adding, that an English fisher-boat had been discharged by order of the Court of France (a thing never done before) without ransom or exchange, on purpose to bring him to England. That, this increasing the Earl's suspicion, Sir John Maclean was told, that, however indemnified he might be in Scotland, he was still liable to the Act of Parliament in England, which made it treason to come hither from France: And that he must expect the rigour of the law, being so justly, from the above-mentioned Circumstances, to be suspected of ill designs. That thereupon he said, He would tell the Earl all he knew, upon assurance of his pardon, and being treated like a Gentleman, so as not to be required to appear in public, as an evidence against any person; of which, by the Queen's orders, he being assured, he then told the Earl of Nottingham, That, in July 1702, the Lord Lovat came to France, and told Sir John Maclean, that he had matters of great importance to communicate to the Queen at St. Germain's, but required a promise from her, not to reveal any thing of what he should say to any of her Ministers. That, this being granted, Sir John Maclean carried him to the Queen, as he did afterwards by her direction, to Monsieur Torcy, to whom, as before to the Queen, he said, that he was come from the Highlands of Scotland, where he had discovered with many heads of Clans, particularly Stewart of Apin, Sir Ewin Cameron, Sir Daniel Macdonal, and others, from whom he brought assurances, that they would rise in arms with ten thousand men, if they were assisted from France with money, arms, and troops to support them. That Monsieur Torcy, after communicating this to the French King, assured him, that his Master would furnish them with money and arms, and also men, so soon as his affairs would admit of the last. And the number agreed on was five thousand, which were to be transported from Lunkirk, and landed at Dundee; from whence the march was short 1703-4. tingham, that Lord wrote it all from his report, and read it to him the next day; upon which he acknowledged, it contained a full account of all he had said. Maclean's discovery to the Lords was a clear series of all the counsels and messages, and it gave a full view of the debates and opinions in the Council at St. Germain's, all which was omitted in that, which was taken by the Earl of Nottingham, and his paper concerning it was both short and dark; there was an appearance of truth, in all that Maclean told, and a regular progress was set forth in it.

Upon these observations those Lords, who were not satisfied with the Earl of Nottingham's paper, intended to have passed a censure upon it, as imperfect. It was said, in the debate that followed this motion, either Maclean was asked, who was to command the army to be sent into Scotland, or he was not. If he was asked the question, and had answered it, then the Earl of Nottingham had not served the Queen, or used the Parliament well, since he had not put it in the paper. If it was not asked, here was great remissness in a Minister, when it was confessed, that the sending over an army was in consultation, not to ask who was to command the army. Upon this occasion, the Earl of Torrington made some reflections, which had too deep a venom in them. He said, That the Earl of Nottingham did prove, that he had often read over the paper, in which he had set down Maclean's confession, in his hearing, and had asked him, if all he had confessed to 1703-4. him was not fully set down in that paper; to which he always answered, That every thing he said was contained in it. Upon this the Earl observed, that, Sir John Maclean having, perhaps, told his whole story to the Earl of Nottingham, and finding afterwards, that he had writ such a defective account of it, he had reason to conclude (for he believed, had he been in his condition, he should have concluded so himself) that the Earl of Nottingham had no mind, that he should mention any thing, but what he had writ down, and that he desired, that the rest might be suppressed. That he could not judge of others but by himself: If his life had been in danger, and if he were interrogated by a Minister of State, who could do him either much good or much hurt, and if he had made a full discovery to him, but had observed, that this Minister, in taking his confession in writing, had omitted many things, he should have understood that as an intimation, that he was to speak of these things no more; and so he believed he should have said it was all, tho', at the same time, he knew it was not all that he had said. It was hereupon moved, that Sir John Maclean might be sent for and interrogated, but the party was not strong enough to carry any thing of that kind; and, by a previous vote, it was carried by a majority of eleven voices, to put no question concerning the Earl of Nottingham's papers (1).

"and easy to the foot of the Highlands; to which, if need were, they might retreat, and, in the mean time, make a stand, and oppose any of the Queen's forces, that might be sent against them, and give time to the Highland Clans to assemble and come to them, and form and increase the army, to be superior to all the Queen's forces in Scotland. That, to facilitate this design, five hundred men were to be sent from Dress, to seize the Fort of Inverlochry, which could not resist cannon, being commanded by hills near it; and that this would give security to ships coming into the river, and be a means to convey supplies of all kinds, as there should be occasion. That the execution of this project was delayed, partly because the French King could not spare his troops, partly because his fleet was not in a condition to oppose the English; partly because he did not intirely rely on the Lord Lovat's information and assurances; and partly, that he might see the event of the Scottish Parliament, by which he might judge of the disposition of the Scots, as well as by some further inquiry, which he intended to make. That therefore Lovat was sent back in May last, which Captain Frazer and Captain John Murray, who had long been in the French service, with orders to come back, as soon as the Scots Parliament was ended, with an account of the inclinations of the people, and what numbers might be relied upon to join with the French. That, besides these, one James Murray was also sent to Scotland, with orders to speak with Duke Hamilton (to whom one Bell was sent before with like directions, and died in Holland) and to engage him in the interest of France, for the support of the Prince of Wales. That there had been other messages sent to him, but the Queen told Sir John Maclean, she had no answer, and therefore ordered Sir John to send his Grace, and, if he found him disposed to her service, then, and not otherwise, to communicate to him this project; which he was also to do to the Duke of Athol and Earl Marechal. And that Stephenfon, a Banker, formerly sent to Duke Hamilton, was, at his return, put into "the Basilie; which was thought to be occasioned by the Duke's not trusting him, and to prevent a discovery, there being so many factions at St. Germain's, that nothing was kept a secret. That afterwards, upon a further examination, Sir John Maclean recollected the names of the persons, and the men they could bring into the field, which Lovat, alias Frazer, reckoned upon, when he gave account to the Court of France of the Scots readiness to rise, if the French would support them. That, the Queen having commanded the Earl of Nottingham to acquaint the Duke of Queensberry with what Sir John Maclean had discovered, his Grace thereupon told the Earl, that this Frazer was the person, who disclosed to him some matters of this nature, with which he had acquainted the Queen, but that he had not told her Majesty his name, being under a solemn engagement to conceal it. That this Frazer was brought to him by the late Duke of Argyle and the Earl of Leven, who were privy to all his proceedings with them. That Frazer was gone to France, and had promised to send an account of all the French designs, and would come back, whenever any thing of moment happened, or that his Grace should require him. Whereupon the Duke of Queensberry was desired to call him back, for he was more likely to do harm than good, by an intelligence, that could be expected from so ill a man.

This account contained, in the next place, the Duke of Athol's proceedings with the Earl of Nottingham, with the substance of Campbell's, Clarke's, Keith's, and Ferguson's examinations.

(1) On the 24th of March, the Lords, after some debate, came to a resolution, "That, Sir John Maclean having made an ingenious confession to the Lords Committees, her Majesty should be addressed to give him as full and complete a pardon, as may consist with the safety of her Majesty and the People, and to provide for his subsistence." And then 1703-4 Ferguson's papers, and passed a severe vote against those Lords who had received such scandalous papers, and had not ordered him to be prosecuted, which they directed the Attorney-General to do. But Ferguson never received the least punishment.

It was apparent, that there was a train of dangerous negotiations, that passed between Scotland and St. Germain's, though the Lords could not penetrate to the bottom of them. And the design of Keith's bringing in his uncle, who knew every step, that had been made, and the whole progress of the affair, to discover the whole scheme of it, was managed so remissly, that it was generally concluded, that it was not in earnest desired it should succeed. During the debates, one very extraordinary thing happened; the Earl of Nottingham affirmed, upon three or four occasions, that some things had been ordered in the Cabinet-Council, which the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, who were likewise of that Council, did not agree with him in. After all these examinations and debates, the Lords concluded the whole matter with voting, That there had been dangerous plots between some in Scotland and the Courts of France and St. Germain's; and that the encouragement of this plotting came from the not settling the Succession to the Crown of Scotland in the House of Hanover. These votes they laid before the Queen in an address, and promised, when the Succession was thus settled, they would endeavour to promote the Union of the two Kingdoms, upon just and reasonable terms. To their address the Queen answered, "That she had some time since declared her intentions, of endeavouring the settlement of the Protestant Succession in Scotland to her servants of that Kingdom, as the most effectual means for securing their quiet and our own, and the readiest way to the intire Union betwixt both Kingdoms, in the perfecting of which, it was very desirable no time should be lost."

March 31. The Lords, after this conclusion of the affair, made a long and vigorous address, or second representation in answer to that which the Commons had made against them; wherein they observed, how uneasy the Commons had been at the whole progress of their inquiry into the Scots conspiracy, and had taken methods to obstruct it all they could; which did not shew that zeal for the Queen's safety, and the preservation of the Nation, to which all men pretended. They annexed to this address a list of many precedents, to shew what good warrants they had for every step they had made; that they had not taken the examination to themselves, so as to exclude others, who had the same right, and might have done it as well as they, if they had pleased; and that their proceeding had been regular and parliamentary, as well as full of zeal and duty to the Queen. They made severe observations on some of the proceedings in the house of Commons, particularly on their not ordering writs to be issued out for some

Boroughs to proceed to new elections, when they, upon pretence of corruption, had voted an election void; which had been practised of late, when it was visible, that the election would not fall on the person they favoured. They charged this as a denial of justice, and of the right, that such Boroughs had to be represented in Parliament, and as an arbitrary and illegal way of proceeding. This address was drawn with great force and beauty by the Lord Sommers, who likewise penned the other addresses, which made a great impression on the body of the Nation; for the difference, that was between these addresses, and those published by the Commons, was so visible, that it did not admit of any comparison, and was confessed even by those, who were the most partial to the Commons. In answer to this last address, the Queen said, "That she hoped none of her subjects had any desire to lessen the prerogative, since she had no thoughts of making use of it, but for their protection and advantage: And that she looked upon it as a great misfortune, when any misunderstanding happened between both Houses of Parliament, which could not be without so much prejudice to the public, that she should never omit any thing in her power to prevent the occasions of them."

These differences between the two Houses were still heightened by the Lords interposing in an affair, the cognizance of which the Commons pretended to belong solely to themselves. There had been great complaints long made, and these had increased within a few years, of great partiality and injustice in the election of Parliament-men, both by Sheriffs in Counties, and by the Returning-officers in Boroughs. In Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire the return was made by four Confitables; and it was believed, that they had made a bargain with some of the Candidates, and then managed the matter so, as to be sure, that the majority should be for the person, to whom they had engaged themselves. They canvassed about the town, to know how the voters were set, and they resolved to find some pretence for disabling those, who were engaged to vote for other persons than their friends, that they might be sure to have the majority in their own hands.

And, when these matters came to be examined by the House of Commons, they gave the election always for him, who was reckoned of the party of the majority in a manner so barefaced, that they were scarce out of countenance, when they were charged for injustice in judging elections. It was not easy to find a remedy against such a crying abuse, of which all sides in their turns, as they happened to be depressed, had made great complaints; but, when they came to be the majority, seemed to forget all, that they had before exclaimed against. Some few excused this on the topic of retaliation, alledging, that they dealt with others as they dealt with them or their friends. At last an action was brought then the order of the Lords, for the close confinement of Sir John Macclean in the Tower of London, was discharged. Upon this recommendation, Sir John Macclean received a considerable pension from the Crown, though, in his heart, in the Queen's time, and openly after her death, he continued in the interest of the Pretender, and died in the rebellion against King George I., in 1715.

1703 4. brought against William White, and the other Conftables of Aylesbury, by one Matthew Afby, who had been always admitted to vote in former elections, but was denied it in the laft election. This action was tried at the Affizes, and it was found there by the Jury, that the Conftables had denied him a right, of which he was undoubtedly in poffeffion, fo that they were caft with damages. But it was moved in the Queen's Bench to quafh all the proceedings in that matter, fince no action did lie, or ever had been brought upon that account. The Judges Powel, Gauld, and Powis were of opinion, that no hurt was done to Afby; that the judging of elections belonged to the Houfe of Commons: That, as this action was the firft of its kind, fo, if it was allowed, it would occasion an infinite number of fuits, and put all the Officers, concerned in that matter, under great difficulties. Chief Juftice Holt alone differed from the reft. He thought this a matter of the greateft importance, both to the whole Nation in general, and to every man in his own particular. He made a great difference between an election of a Member, and a right to vote in it. That the Houfe of Commons were the only Judges of the former, whether it was rightly managed or not, without bribery, fraud, or violence; but the right of voting in an election was an original right founded either on a freehold of forty fhillings a year in the County, or on burgage-land, or prefcRIPTION, or by charter, in a Borough. Thefe were all legal titles, and, as fuch, were triable in a Court of law. Acts of Parliament were made concerning them, and, by reafon of thefe, every thing relating to thofe acts was triable in a Court of law. He fpoke long and learnedly, and with fome vehemence, upon the fubject; but he was one againft three, and therefore the order of the Queen's Bench was given in favour of the Conftables. The matter was upon that brought before the Houfe of Lords by a writ of error; the cafe was very fully argued at the bar, and the Judges were ordered to deliver their opinion upon it, which they did very copioufly. Chief Juftice Trevor infifted much on the authority, that the Houfe of Commons had to judge of all thofe elections. From that he inferred, that the Commons only could judge, who were the Electors. Petitions were often grounded on this, that in a poll fome were admitted to a vote, who had no right to it, and that others were denied it, who had a right; fo that in fome cafes the Commons were the proper Judges of this right, and, if they had it in fome Cafes, they muft have it in all. From this he inferred, that every thing relating to this matter was triable by them, and by them only. If two independent jurifdictions might have the fame caufe brought before them, they might give contrary judgments in it; and this muft breed great diftraction in the execution of thofe judgments.

To all this it was answered, that a fingle man, who was wronged in this matter, had no other remedy but by bringing it into a Court of law; for the Houfe of Commons could not examine the right of every voter: If the man, for whom he would have voted, was returned, he could not be heard to complain to the Houfe of Commons, though in his own particular he was denied a vote, fince he could not make any exceptions to the return, and therefore muft bear 1703-4. his wrong without a remedy, if he could not bring it into a Court of law. A right of voting in an election was the greateft of all the rights of an Englifhman, fince by that he was represented in Parliament. The Houfe of Commons could give no relief to a man wronged in this point, nor any damages; they could only fet afide one, and admit of another return. But this was no redrefs to him, who fuffered the wrong; it made him the lefs confidered in his borough, and that might be a real damage to him in his trade. Since this was a right inherent in a man, it feemed reasonable, that it fhould be brought, where all other rights were tried, into a Court of law. The abufe was new, and was daily growing, and it was already fwelled to a great height. When new diforders happen, new actions muft lie, otherwife there is a failure in juftice, which all laws abhor. Practices of this fort were enormous and crying; and if the rule made in the Queen's Bench was affirmed, it would very much increafe thefe diforders by this indemnity, that feemed to be given to Officers, who took the poll.

After a long debate, it was carried by a great majority to fet afide the order of the Queen's Bench, and to give judgment according to the verdict given at the Affizes. This gave great offence to the Commons, who, looking on thefe proceedings as incroachments on their privileges, after having infpected the Lords Journals, refolved, “ 1. That, according to the known Jan. 26. “ Laws and uſage in Parliament, it is the ſole “ right of the Commons of England, in Parlia- “ ment aſſembled (except in cafes otherwiſe “ provided for by act of Parliament) to ex- “ amine and determine all matters relating to “ the right of election of their own Members. “ 2. That neither the qualification of any Elec- “ tor, or the right of any perſon elected, is “ cognizable or determinable elſewhere than be- “ fore the Commons. 3. That the examining “ and determining the qualification or right of “ any Elector, or any perſon elected to ſerve in “ Parliament, in any Court of law, or elſe- “ where, than before the Commons, will ex- “ poſe all Mayors, Bailiffs, and other Officers, “ who are obliged to take the poll, and make “ a return thereupon, to multiplicity of actions, “ vexatious ſuits, and ſupportable expences, “ and will ſubject them to different and inde- “ pendent jurifdictions, and inconſiſtent deter- “ minations in the ſame caſe, without relief. “ 4. That Matthew Afby, having, in contempt “ of the jurifdiction of this Houſe, commenced “ and profecuted an action at common law a- “ gainſt William White and others, the Conſta- “ bles of Aylesbury, for not receiving his vote “ at an election of Burgeſſes to ſerve in Parlia- “ ment for that Borough, is guilty of a breach “ of the privileges of this Houſe. 5. That “ whoever ſhall preſume to commence or pro- “ ſecute any action, indictment, or information, “ which ſhall bring the rights of the Electors, “ or perſons elected to ſerve in Parliament, to “ the determination of any other jurifdiction “ than that of the Houſe of Commons (except “ in cafes ſpecially provided for by act of Parlia- “ ment) ſuch perſon or perſons, and all Attor- “ nies, Solicitors, Counſellors, and Serjeants at “ law, ſoliciting, proſecuting, or pleading in “ any 1703-4. "any such case, are guilty of a high breach of the privilege of this House." And they ordered these resolutions to be fixed upon Westminster-Hall-Gate, signed by the Clerk. However, they did not think fit to send for Ashby, who had sued, or rather, in whose name the suit was carried on, but let the matter fall as to him, under a shew of moderation and pity, and rested it upon the general votes. On the other hand, the Lords appointed a Committee to draw up the state of the case upon the writ of error, wherein Ashby was plaintiff, and William White and others defendants; which Committee having made their report, their Lordships resolved,

"1. That, by the known laws of this Kingdom, every Freeholder, or other person having a right to give his vote at the election of Members to serve in Parliament, and being wilfully denied or hindered so to do by the Officer, who ought to receive the same, may maintain an action in the Queen's Courts against such Officer, to assert his right, and recover damage for the injury. 2. That the asserting, That a person having a right to give his vote at an election, and being hindered so to do by the Officer, who ought to take the same, is without remedy for such wrong, by the ordinary course of law, is destructive of the property of the subjects, against the freedom of elections, and manifestly tends to encourage corruption and partiality in Officers, who are to make returns to Parliament, and to subject Freeholders, and other Electors, to their arbitrary will and pleasure. 3. That the declaring Matthew Ashby guilty of a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, for prosecuting an action against the Constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his vote at an election, after he had, in the known and proper methods of law, obtained a judgment in Parliament for recovery of his damages, is an unprecedented attempt upon the Judicature of Parliament, and is, in effect, to subject the law of England to the votes of the House of Commons. And. 4. That the deterring Electors from prosecuting actions in the ordinary course of law, when they are deprived of their right of voting, and terrifying Attornies, Solicitors, Counsellors, and Serjeants at Law, from soliciting, prosecuting, and pleading in such cases, by voting their so doing

"to be a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, is a manifest assuming a power to controul the law, and hinder the course of justice, and subject the property of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons." The Lords likewise ordered the Lord-Keeper to send a copy of the case, and of their resolutions, to all the Sheriffs of England, to be communicated to all the Boroughs in their Counties. The Commons were highly provoked with this, but they could not hinder it. The thing was popular, and the Lords got great credit by the judgment given by them, which let the people of England see, how they might be redressed for the future, if they should meet with the injustice, the partiality, and other ill practices, that had appeared of late in elections, even beyond the examples of former times (1).

The Anniversary of the Queen's birth-day falling this year on a Sunday, the solemnizing of it was deferred till the next day, when the sent a message to the House of Commons by Mr. Secretary Hedges, importing, "That her Majesty, having taken into her serious consideration the mean and insufficient maintenance belonging to the Clergy in divers parts of this Kingdom, to give them some ease, had been pleased to remit the arrears of the first-fruits and tenths to the poor Clergy; and, for an augmentation of their maintenance, her Majesty declared, that she would make a grant of her whole revenue arising out of the first-fruits and tenths, as far as it should become free from incumbrances, to be applied to this purpose: And, if the House of Commons could find any proper method, by which her Majesty's good intentions to the poor Clergy might be made more effectual, it would be a great advantage to the public, and acceptable to her Majesty."

The first-fruits and tenths was an imposition begun by the Popes in the time of the Holy wars, and it was raised as a fund to support those expeditions. But, when taxes are once raised by such an arbitrary power, as the Popes then assumed, and after there has been a submission, and the payments have been settled into a custom, they are always continued, even after the pretence, upon which they were at first raised, subsists no more. Thus this became a standing branch of the Papal revenue, till Henry

(1) Another affair also gave the House of Commons an occasion to vent their ill humour against the Lords. On the 20th of January, Charles Bathurst, Esq; presented a petition to the House of Commons, touching an order made by the Lords, the 12th of February 1702-3, with relation to "an order of the Court of Exchequer made the 15th of July, in the 13th year of King William, concerning an inquisition and survey of the boundaries of the honour of Richmond and Lordship of Middleham; and praying such relief on the subject-matter of the petition, as the House should think meet." The Commons, having examined by some of their Members proceedings in relation to this affair, after a long debate, on the 27th of January, resolved, "That the House of Lords taking cognizance of, and proceeding upon the petition of Thomas Lord Wharton, complaining of an order of the Court of Exchequer, bearing date the 15th of July 1701, for filing the record of a survey of the honour of Richmond and of Middleham in the County "of York, is without precedent, and unwarrantable, and tends to the subjecting the Rights and Properties of all the Commons of England to an illegal and arbitrary power: And that it is the undoubted right of all the subjects of England, to make such use of the said record, as they might by law have done before the said proceedings of the House of Lords." In answer to this, the Lords, on the 27th of March, resolved and declared, "That the House of Commons taking upon them by their votes, to condemn a judgment of the House of Lords given in a cause depending before this House in the last Session of Parliament, upon the petition of Thomas Lord Wharton, and to declare what the law is, in contradiction to the proceedings of the House of Lords, is without precedent, unwarrantable, and an usurpation of a Judicature, in which they have no sort of pretence:" ordering at the same time, that this resolution should be forthwith printed and published.

1703-4. ry VIII. seemed resolved to take it away. It was first abolished for a year, probably to draw in the Clergy to consent the more willingly to a change, that delivered them from such heavy impositions. But, in the succeeding Session of Parliament, this revenue was again settled as part of the income of the Crown for ever. It is true, it was the more easily borne, because the rates were still at the old value, which in some places was not the tenth, and in most not above the fifth part of the true value; and the Clergy had been often threatened with a new valuation, in which the rates should be rigorously set to their full extent. The tenths amounted to about eleven thousand pounds a year; and the first-fruits, which were more casual, rose one year with another to five thousand pounds, so that the whole amounted to between sixteen and seventeen thousand pounds a year. This was not brought into the Treasury, as the other branches of the revenue were; but the Bishops, who had been the Pope's collectors, were now the King's; and persons in favour obtained assignments on them for life, or for a term of years. This had never been applied to any good use, but was still obtained by Favourites for themselves and their friends; and, in Charles II.'s time, it was distributed chiefly among his women and natural children. It seemed strange, that, while the Clergy had much credit at Court, they had never represented this as sacrilege, unless it was applied to some religious purpose; and, that during Archbishop Laud's favour with King Charles I. or at the Restoration of King Charles II., no endeavours had been used to appropriate this to better uses. When Bishop Burnet wrote the History of the Reformation, he considered this matter so particularly, that he saw there was a fund for providing better subsistence for the poor Clergy, there being some hundred of Cures, which had not of certain provision twenty pounds a year, and some thousands, that had not fifty. He therefore represented this case afterward to Queen Mary, in such a light, that she was fully resolved, if ever she lived to see peace and settlement, to have cleared this branch of the revenue of all the assignments, that were upon it, and to have applied it to the augmentation of small benefices. The Bishops afterwards laid the matter before King William, when there was a prospect of peace, hoping, that this might have gained the King the hearts of the Clergy, or at least have put a stop to a groundless clamour raised against him, that he was an enemy to the Clergy, which began then to have a very ill effect on all his affairs. The King entertained this so well, that he ordered the Bishop to speak to the Ministers about it, who all approved of it; more particularly, the Lords Sommers and Halifax: But the Earl of Sunderland obtained an assignment upon two Dioceses for two thousand pounds a year for two lives; so that nothing was to be expected after that. The Bishop laid the matter very fully before the Princess of Denmark, during King William's life, and had often spoken of it to the Lord Godolphin. This time was perhaps chosen to pacify the angry Clergy, who were dissatisfied with the Court; and began now to talk of the danger the Church was in, as much as they had done during the former Reign. When the Queen's message was brought to the House of Commons, some of the Whigs, particularly Sir John Holland and Sir Joseph Jekyll, moved, that the Clergy might be entirely freed from that tax, since they bore as heavy a share of other taxes; and that another fund might be raised of the same value, out of which small Benefices might be augmented. But this was violently opposed by Sir Christopher Musgrave, and other Tories, who said, that the Clergy ought to be kept still in a dependance on the Crown.

Upon the Queen's message, a bill was brought in, enabling her to alienate this branch of the revenue, and to create a Corporation by Charter, to apply it to the use, for which the now gave it. They added to this a repeal of the statute of Mortmain, so far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed or by their last wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmenting of Benefices. It was suggested, that this addition was made in hope, that it would be rejected by the Lords, and that the scandal of losing the bill might lie upon them. It occasioned a great debate in the House of Lords: It was said, that this law was made and kept up, even during the times of Popery; and it seemed not reasonable to open a door to practices upon dying men. It was answered, That we had not the arts of affrighting men by the terrors of Purgatory, or by fables of Apparitions. Where these were practised, it was very reasonable to restrain Priests from those artifices, by which they had so enriched their Church, that, without some such effectual checks, they would have swallowed up the whole wealth of the world, as they had indeed in England, during Popery, made themselves masters of a full third part of the Nation. The Bishops were so zealous and unanimous for the bill, that it was carried and passed into a law. The Queen was pleased to let it be known, that the first motion of this matter came from Bishop Burnet. Such a project would have been much magnified at another time; and those, who had promoted it, would have been looked upon as the truest friends of the Church. But this did not seem to make any great impression at that time; nor to have much effect in softening the tempers of peevish men. Only it produced a set of addresses from all the Clergy of England, full of thanks and just acknowledgments.

The House of Commons shewed a very unusual neglect of all that related to the fleet, which used to be one of their chief cares. It was furnished, they saw that, if they opened that door, discoveries would be made of errors, which Pr. H. L. could neither be justified nor palliated; and that these discoveries must come home chiefly to their Favourites; for which reason they avoided all examinations, that would probably draw some censure on them. But the Lords were not so tender; they made an enquiry into the condition of the Navy, and ordered, "That, by reason of the great want of men, the observation they had made to put into an address, where they said (six thousand) the allowed complement for the whole number of ships, necessary for the defence of the Kingdom, could not be depended upon; they thought it a duty incumbent on them to make an humble application to her Majesty, desiring, that she would 1703-4. "be pleased to give speedy and effectual orders, that such a number of ships, proper for the home-service, might be forthwith got ready and manned." This address being an oblique reflection on Prince George, High-Admiral of England, the Queen answered, "That she was glad they found no great number of seamen wanting at this season of the year; and she hoped such effectual measures were already taken, that no service should be disappointed either at home or abroad, which was necessary for the security and advantage of the Kingdom, or the protection and encouragement of Trade." However the Lords carried on their

March 17. Inquiries into the affairs of the Navy, and came to this resolution: "That Vice-Admiral Graydon, with a squadron of her Majesty's ships of war under his convoy, meeting with four French ships in his passage to the West-Indies, and letting them escape without attacking them, according to his duty, from the pretence of his instructions, had been a prejudice to the Queen's service, and a great dishonour to the Nation." The next day they likewise resolved, "That Vice-Admiral Graydon's disorderly proceedings in pressing men in Ja-maica, and severe usage of masters of merchant-men and transport vessels under his convoy there, had been a great discouragement to the inhabitants of that island, and prejudicial to her Majesty's service. And, secondly, that Admiral Graydon, having behaved himself so ill in this expedition to the West-Indies, might be employed no more in her Majesty's service." They also resolved,

March 23. "That an address be presented to the Queen to remove Admiral Graydon from all places of trust in the Government, for impressing servants in the West-Indies on board of his Squadron, to the ruin and destruction, and against the laws of those islands; and that her Majesty would be pleased to order her Attorney-General to prosecute him at law for the same."

The Lords proceeded likewise in their examinations of the clamour made of the waste of the public treasure in the last Reign, and of the Earl of Orford's accounts, which amounted to seventeen millions, and upon which some observations had been made by the Commissioners of the public accounts, and found them all to be false in fact, or ill grounded, and of no importance. The only particular, which seemed to give a just colour to exception, was very strictly examined. The Earl had victualled the fleet, while they lay all winter at Cádiz: The purifiers receipts, for the quantity that was laid into every ship, were produced, but they had no receipts of the Spaniards, from whom they had bought the provisions; but they had entered the prices of them in their own books, and these were given in upon oath. This matter had been much canvassed in King William's time, and it stood thus: The Earl, when he had been ordered to lie before Cádiz, wrote to the board of Victualling to send over a person to provide the fleet. They answered, that their credit was then so low, that they could not undertake it; and therefore he was desired to do it upon his own credit. It appeared, that no fleet nor single ship had ever been victualled so cheap, as the fleet was then by him. It was not the custom in Spain to give receipts; but, if any fraud had been intended, it would have been easy to have got the Spaniards, 1703-4. after they had their money, to have signed any receipts, that could have been offered them, for swelling the accounts; for that practice in their dealings with their own Court was well known there. Upon these reasons, the Lords of the Treasury had passed his accounts, and were of opinion, that he had done great service to the Government in that whole transaction. The House of Lords now confirmed this, and ordered an account of that whole matter to be printed.

The Commons made no progress in any discoveries of ill practices in the Earl of Rossel's office, but concluded that matter with an address to the Queen, that she would order a prosecution. This was an artifice to make the Nation still think, that great discoveries of corruption might be made, if carefully looked after. It was expected, after such an outcry, as they had made, and after the expence the Nation was put to for this Commission for examining of the public accounts, and the extraordinary powers, that were lodged with the Commissioners, that at least some important discoveries should have been made by them. The Commons sent up a Bill to the Lords for continuing the Commission for another year. It was observed, that an alteration was made of let fall the persons; some, who expected better places, having got their names to be left out. The Lords excepted to Mr. Bierly (who was named to be one of the Commissioners) because he had been a Colonel, and had not yet cleared the accounts of his own regiment; for which reason they struck out his name, and named another, and added two more, who were not Members of the House of Commons. The reason of this was, because the Members of that House would not appear before them to explain some particulars, and only sent their Clerk to inform them; and, when the Lords sent a message to the House of Commons, to desire them to order their Members to attend on their Committees, all the return they had was, that they would send an answer by messengers of their own; but this was evasive, for they sent no such message. The Lords therefore thought it necessary, in order to their being better informed, to put some in the Commission for the future, who should be bound to attend upon them, as often as they should be called for. The Commons rejected these Amendments, and pretended, that this was of the nature of a money-bill; and that therefore the Lords could make no alterations in it. The message, which the Commons sent the Lords upon this head, came so near the end of the Session, that the Lords could not return an answer to it, with the reasons, for which they insisted on their Amendments; so the bill fell. The charge of this Commission amounted to eight thousand pounds a year. The Commissioners made much noise, and brought many persons before them to be examined, and gave great disturbance to all the public offices, by their being obliged to attend on them, and, to copy out all their books for their perusal; and yet, in a course of many years, they had not made any one discovery. Thus a full stop was put to this way of proceeding.

One of the most considerable acts, passed this Session, was for raising recruits for the land-recruits, forces and marines, which empowered the Justices

A Bill for examining the public accounts
Burnet.

1703-4. tices of Peace, or any three of them, to take up such idle persons, as had no calling nor means of subsistence, and to deliver them to the officers of the army, upon paying them the levy money, that was allowed for making recruits. The method of raising these hitherto by drinking and other bad practices, as they were justly odious, so they were now so well known, that they were no more of any effect; so that the army could not be recruited but by the help of this act; which, if well managed, might prove of great advantage to the Nation, since by this means they would be delivered from many vicious and idle persons, who were a burthen to their country. And indeed of late years there was such an increase of the poor, that their maintenance was become in most places a very heavy load, and amounted to the full half of the public taxes. The party in both Houses, who had been all along cold and backward in the war, opposed this act with unusual vehemence, pretending zeal for the public liberty and the freedom of the persons, to which, by the constitution, they said every Englishman had a right; which they thought could not be given away but by a legal judgment, and for some crime. They thought this put a power into the hands of Justices of Peace, which might be stretched and abused to serve bad purposes. Thus men who seemed engaged to an interest, that was destructive to all liberty, could yet make use of that specious pretence, to serve their purpose. The chief objection made to this act in the House of Lords was, that the Justices of Peace had been put in and out in so strange a manner, ever since Sir Nathan Wright had the Great Seal, that they did not deserve, that so large a power should be committed to them. Many Gentlemen of good estates and ancient families had been of late put out of the commission for no other visible reason, but because they had entered heartily into the Revolution, and had continued zealous for King William. This seemed done on design to mark them, and so lessen the interest they had in the elections of Members of Parliament; and at the same time men of no worth, nor estate, and known to be ill affected to the Queen's title and to the Protestant succession, were put in, to the great encouragement of ill-designing men. All was managed by secret accusations, and characters, that were partially given. The Lord-Keeper was a zealot to the party, and was become very exceptionable in all respects. Money, as was said, did every thing with him; only in his court, he was never charged with any thing but great slowness, by which the chancery was become one of the heaviest grievances of the Nation.

March 31. An address was presented by the Lords to the Queen complaining of the Commissions of Peace, in which the Lords delivered their opinion that such as would not serve, or act under the late King, were not fit to serve her Majesty.

Besides the bill that passed for the recruiting of the land-forces, there was likewise another brought into the House of Commons for the same purpose, by obliging the several Parishes or Corporations in England to furnish a certain number of men. But, this being a copy of what is practised in France, and other despotic Governments, it was rejected.

On the 3d of April, the Queen came to the 1703-4. House of Peers, and, having given the Royal assent to several acts, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Cannot put an end to this Session, without returning you thanks for the willingness, which you have all expressed to support and assist me in continuing the present war."

"And I must thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, very particularly, for the great forwardness and zeal, which you have shewn, both in the early dispatch of the supplies, and in making them so effectual for carrying on the public expence, without any additional burthen upon the Country. It shall be my care to improve this to the best advantage."

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"At the opening of this Session, I did earnestly express my desires of seeing you in perfect unity among yourselves, as the most effectual means imaginable to disappoint the ambition of our enemies, and reduce them to an honourable and lasting peace. And though this has not met with all the success, which I wished and expected, yet being fully convinced, that nothing is so necessary to our common welfare, I am not discouraged from persisting in the same earnest desires, that you would go down into your several Countries so disposed to moderation and unity, as becomes all those, who are joined together in the same Religion and interest."

"This, I am persuaded, will make you sensible, that nothing, next to the blessing of God, can so much contribute to our success abroad, and our safety at home."

The Queen having ended her speech, the Parliament was prorogued to the 4th of July following.

Thus ended this Session of Parliament after much heat and contention between the two Houses; and though the Queen in her speech recommended to them union and moderation, yet those words, which had hitherto carried so good a sound, that all sides pretended to them, were now become so odious to violent men, that even in sermons, especially at Oxford, they were arraigned as importing somewhat, that was unkind to the Church, and that favoured the Dissenters. The House of Commons had, during this Session, lost much of their reputation, not only with fair and impartial judges, but even with those, who were most inclined to favour them. It is true, the body of the Freeholders began to be uneasy under the taxes, and to cry out for a peace; and most of the considerable Gentry of England, who had most to lose, seemed not to apprehend the dangers the nation was in, if it should fall under the power of France, and into the hands of the Pretender; or else they were so fatally blinded, as not to see, that these must be the consequences of those measures, Proceed- into which they were engaged.

The Convocation sitting again this winter with the Parliament, they were divided as between the Convoca- tion. Burnet 1092. Calamy.

1703-4. fore. The Lower-House continued their former practices, but little opposition was made to them, as little regard was had of them. They began, December 8, with sending up a paper to the Archbishop and Bishops, signifying, that, being called together to consult about such matters as concerned the safety, honour, and advantage of the Church, they thought themselves obliged, above all things, to have a regard to the soundness of its doctrine, and to labour some effectual provision against its being corrupted and depraved: And therefore they reminded their Lordships of the daring licentiousness of the prebts, through which there had, for some years past, severals books been printed, published, and dispersed, in which, not only the worship and discipline of the Church, but the known fundamentals of our Holy Religion, had been impugned, &c. They added, that they had other things lying before them, relating to the discipline of the Church, which they conceived to be fit matter to be inquired into by a Convocation: As clandestine marriages, and the scandal said to be given by neglect or non-observance of the Ecclesiastical laws and canons in regard to commutations: But that, these things requiring time, they laid this complaint against Heretical and Atheistical books before them by itself. And they begged their Lordships would take the matter into their serious consideration, not doubting, but that, through their great wisdom, and interest with those in whom a sufficient power is lodged, to effect so good a work, some speedy remedy might be found, and a stop put to so growing an evil.

The same day also, they, by another paper, laid before their Lordships the inconveniences to which they were liable, for want of a more effectual method for recovering rates made for the repair of Churches and Chapels. They desired it might be considered, how far it was proper for the two Houses of Convocation to join in preparing such a bill to be offered in Parliament, as might enforce the raising such rates in the most effectual manner, consistent with the ancient liberties of Holy Church, and the Ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

In February 1703-4, the Lower-House sent up a representation to the Bishops, intimating, that having, by a message brought by their Prolocutor from his Grace, been encouraged Dec. 15. to hope, that against their meeting, on February 4, sufficient power might have been procured for the joint dispatch of Synodical business, they had employed several Members in preparing heads of matters fit to be offered to their Lordships consideration. In this representation they mentioned some abuses in the Ecclesiastical discipline, and in the Consistorial Courts: But took no care to insist upon those greater abuses of pluralities, non-residence, neglect of cures, and the irregularities of the lives of the Clergy, which were too visible (1).

When the House of Commons thanked the Queen for the grant of the first-fruits and tenths for the augmentation of small livings, the Convocation presented the like address, and the Lower-House sent their Prolocutor with some of their Members, to wait upon the Speaker of the House of Commons, by him to return their thanks to that Honourable House, for their espousing the interest of the Clergy, and promising to pursue such methods, as might best conduce to the support, honour, interest, and security of the Church of England, as now by law established: And these thanks of theirs, as the Speaker assured them by a letter in return, were received with the respect and affection justly due to that Reverend and Learned Body of the Clergy.

On March 10, 1703-4, The Lower-House sent up a paper to the Upper, asserting their right to be summoned, as often as a new Parliament was called, and that according to the tenor of the clause

(1) As this representation will be mentioned again in the next Convocation, it may be proper to insert the substance of it. The Lower-House represented, that a general neglect of divers Canons and Constitutions, now in force, tends to introduce such customs, as may in time, be interpreted to amount to a prescription: And complained, that matter of great offence had been administered to pious Christians, and many evil consequences might arise from the practice of such Ministers, as read not the Common Prayer, distinctly, reverently, and intirely (as by the Rubric, and by the fourteenth Canon they are obliged to do) without either diminishing in regard of preaching, or in any other respect, or adding any thing in the matter and form thereof.

They also complained, That the unjustifiable use of the form of public Baptism, in private houses, had lessened the reverence due to that office; and had occasioned those undue practices of mutilating the public form, and baptizing without the sign of the cross, or Godfathers and Godmothers: That Churchwardens were remiss in not making due provision for the Administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper: That decency and order were not duly observed in several Churches, and that several were irreverent and disorderly, covering their heads in time of divine service, &c.: That due care was not taken about holy orders; and here the things particularly complained of, were, the little caution used by some in granting, and by others in allowing of letters testimonial; the not insisting on true, certain, and sufficient titles; the want of a strict and diligent examination of such as offered themselves to be ordained; and an unnecessary Ordination of persons without degrees or education, &c. That frequent abuses happened by clandestine marriages, &c.: That excommunicated persons were not denounced as the sixty-fifth Canon prescribed; for want of which, the awe of Excommunication had been diminished: That there were great abuses about commutations of Penance: That persons were suffered to instruct youth without due licences; and ignorant and disaffected persons encouraged to erect Seminaries, to the prejudice of the two Universities, and in which such principles are instilled into youth, as tend to perpetuate Schism, and subvert the Established Constitution: That persons were admitted to be Chancellors or Officials, and exercise Ecclesiastical jurisdiction, without taking any degree in any University: That the presentments of Churchwardens were commonly defective, and yet they went unpunished: That the practice of Registers was corrupt: That the seal of Jurisdiction has been kept by other persons besides the Judges themselves, and their lawful Substitutes: That inconveniences have arisen for want of registering Testaments: That excessive fees were exacted for collations and institutions: That fees were unnecessarily demanded at Visitations, &c.: That gross errors were committed in some late editions of the Bible and the Liturgy: And that the Stage was guilty of great immorality and profaneness. The articles of this representation were twenty-one in number.

1703-4. clause Premunites, as well as by virtue of the Royal writ, and Archiepiscopal mandate: And complaining, that this had been omitted in many Dioceses; and that even the Royal writ itself, and his Grace's mandate pursuant to it, had not been executed at all this Convocation, in the Diocese of Bangor. They also asserted their right to have a Prolocutor chosen and admitted, at first, and as often as that office should be vacant by death or promotion; and to assume an Actuary, and have a convenient place for debates; and to dispose of the intermediate time, as they thought good (1).

March 17. The Archbishop, in a short speech, told the inferior Clergy, that orders were given for making out copies of their representation, both for the present and absent Bishops, and that a proper use should be made of it, especially at visitations. When the Lower-House was with the Archbishop, on April the 3d, the day the Parliament was prorogued, he spoke more largely to them of their representation, as he had promised them. He owned to them their right to complain of real abuses and grievances in the Church, but observed, that some of their complaints did not come properly under the power of the Canons, or the authority purely Ecclesiastical: And that those of them, that were properly Ecclesiastical, were laid down as particulars preparative to a Royal licence: And that the abuses complained of had not commenced within a few years last past, or been passed over every where with supineness and disregard: And that many of the abuses they referred to, were mentioned in King William's Injunctions, and his own circular letter in pursuance of them, Anno 1695. He told them withal, that, since the time of our public deliverance from the open attempts of Popery, there have never been more frequent and careful Visitations of Bishops in person, never more precautions and strict examinations before giving orders in most Dioceses, never more solemn and orderly Confirmations, even in very many places, where a Bishop had not been seen since the Reformation. He also said, they had promoted the good design of setting up schools of instruction for the poor, been concerned for the propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, in pressing the frequent catechizing of youth, and helping forward the conversion of Dissenters of all sorts, by sound arguments and gentle methods, and exerting themselves in behalf of the Protestant Succession, which is necessary to the preserving the Queen, and the faith of which she is defender. And yet he owned, there was reason for all possible care and diligence in rectifying abuses; and that the Bishops needed their assistance. With this speech ended the Session of the Convocation, at the same time with that of the Parliament.

It is here observed*, that the Universities, * Barnet. especially Oxford, had been very unhappily successful in propagating anti-revolutional principles in those, who were sent to be bred among them; so that few escaped the taint of it, and the generality of the Clergy were not only wrong-principled but ill-tempered. They exclaimed against all moderation as endangering the Church, tho' it was visible, that the Church was in no sort of danger, either from the number or interest of the Protestant Dissenters, who, by reason of the Toleration, were now so quietted, that nothing could keep up any heat in those matters, but the bad humour which the Clergy were possessed with, and which they infused into all those, with whom they had any credit. At the same time, the great and visible danger of Popery, which, upon a miscarriage in the war, would have broke in like an irresistible deluge, was neither perceived nor apprehended.

Whilst the Parliament was sitting, the States-General having represented to the Queen, of Mar- borough how great advantage the Duke of Marlborough's coming to the Hague would be to the Confeder- Holland. Jan. 15. Barnet. deracy, by concerting there with them the measures proper to be taken at that juncture, and having desired her Majesty to give his Grace leave to pass the sea for a few days, the Duke went over in January to the Hague, where he received the compliments of all the public Ministers, the General Officers, and other Persons of Quality. He had several Conferences with the Deputies of the States-General, in which there was a scheme formed for the operations of the next campaign. It was resolved, that, instead of a fruitless campaign in the Netherlands, they would have only a small army there to lie on the defensive, which was to be commanded by Monsieur Antverperque; but that, since

(1) Several treatises were published upon this controversy, the chief of which was, The State of the Church and Clergy of England in their Council, Synods, &c. by Dr. Wake. In the Preface, he laments his being obliged to engage in such a controversy; passes a censure on his own former work, and freely complains of Dr. A. for his wrathful and uncharitable spirit; his obscurity, and his confidence; and says, that there was scarce a leaf in his book that would bear a rigorous scrutiny, and but few that would stand the most favourable examination. In his first Chapter, he considers the several kinds of Assemblies of the Clergy of England, in a Parliamentary Convention, a Provincial Convocation, in Diocesan Synods, and Provincial Councils. In the Second, he sets himself by arguments to prove the real difference both in law and fact, between a Parliamentary Convention of the Clergy, summoned by the Premunitory Clause; and Provincial Conventions, summoned by the King's writs to the two Archbishops. He shews, they have different rights, powers and privileges as such. In the Third he shews, That the Bishops and Clergy have a right to be assembled in Convocation, at any, and all times, whenever the affairs of the Church require their consultation, or any benefit may thence accrue to Religion: But have no obligation to attend upon the Parliament, much less be forced to continue their attendance during every Session, when they have either nothing to do, or nothing to counter-vail the trouble and charge of such an attendance. In the Fourth he shews, That the Convocation has not, as a proper Provincial Council, any right to meet once a year, by virtue of the ancient Canons. In the Vth, VIth, VIIth, and VIIIth Chapters, he proves, that, neither in the time of Edward I. nor of any of the succeeding Reigns to the time of Henry VIII. did the two Convocations attend upon the Parliament, nor was it accounted their duty or privilege so to do. In Chap. IX, he shews that no right can in this case be proved from custom. In the Tenth, he considers the right of the Convocation to treat of Canons and Constitutions, without the assent or licence of the Prince. And at the end there is a large Appendix, of instruments and records, very few of which were ever published before.

1703-4. since the Rhine was open by the taking of Bonne all up to the Moselle, their main army, which was to be commanded by the Duke of Mariborough, should act there. More was not understood to be designed, except by those few, who were let into the secret. Upon this, all the preparations for the campaign were ordered to be carried up the Rhine, that all things might be in a readiness, when he should come over to take the field. The true secret was in few hands, and the French had no intimation of it, and consequently had no apprehensions about it. These matters being settled, the Duke left the Hague and returned to London.

Feb. 14. Changes in the Ministry. Burnet.

The Earl of Nottingham resigns.

The Earl of Jersey and Sir Edward Seymour dismissed.

The Earl of Kent made Lord Chamberlain. Mansel Comptroller. Harley Secretary of State. St. John Secretary at war. A libel prosecuted by the Gloucestershire Justices.

The Earl of Nottingham was animated by the party to press the Queen to dismiss the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire from the Cabinet-Council, or at least, that they might be called thither no more. He moved it often, but, finding no inclination in the Queen to comply with his motion, he carried the seals to her, and told her, that he could not serve any longer in Councils, to which those Lords were admitted. The Queen desired him to consider better of it, but he returned next day fixed in his first resolution, to which he adhered the more steadily, because the Queen had sent to the Earl of Jersey for the Lord-Chamberlain's staff, and to Sir Edward Seymour for the Comptroller's. The Earl of Jersey was a weak man, but crafty and well-practised in the arts of a Court. His Lady was a Papist, and it was believed, that, while he was Ambassador in France, he was secretly reconciled to the court of St. Germain's, for after that he seemed to be in their interests. It was one of the reproaches of King William's Reign, that this Earl had so much credit with him; and the King was so sensible of it, that, if he had lived a little longer, he would have dismissed him. He was considered as the person, who was now in the closest correspondence with the Court of France; and, though he was in himself a very inconsiderable man, yet he was applied to by all those, who wished well to the Court of St. Germain's. His staff of Lord-Chamberlain was given to the Earl of Kent, who was the first Earl of England, and had a great estate. Mr. Mansel, the heir of a very considerable family in Wales, was made Comptroller of the Household; and, after a month's delay, Mr. Harley, the Speaker, was declared Secretary of State, and Mr. Henry St. John was appointed Secretary at war in the room of Blaisbawyle.

The late differences between the Lords and Commons had raised so great a ferment in the Nation, that the Parliament had not long been prorogued, before a paper was printed and dispersed, intitled, Legion's humble address to the Lords, wherein the proceedings of the Commons, with relation to the Aylsbury business, and the examination of the Scots plot, were reflected on with great freedom. The first were taxed as arbitrary and illegal, contrary to the liberties of Englishmen, destructive of the rights of election, and an invasion of the Nation's jurisdiction. And, as to the other, it was suggested, "that the complimenting her Majesty with the title of a Queen sitting on the Throne of her Ancestors by right of Succession from her Father, when, at the same time, they knew her right depended upon the validity of Parlia- ment-limitation, and was built on the foot of the late Revolution, and the act of Settlement, was a barbarous treachery to the whole Nation, an insolent affront to her Majesty, an insinuation of the title of the pretended Prince of Wales, and a villainous attempt to destroy the present settlement of the Succession, and was consequently high treason by their own act of Parliament: And that to address her Majesty to extend her prerogative, and thereby to embroil her with the privilege of the Peers, was the most aggravated piece of treachery, that ever House of Commons was or could be guilty of; the same being an affront to her Majesty, a malicious design on her person, by persuading her to enter on that very thing, the exorbitant practice whereof was the ruin of her Father and Grandfather; an unprecedented attempt upon the liberties of the people, and a meddling with what they have no power or right to touch. Their Lordships were likewise applauded for their zeal, courage, and fidelity, in vindicating their own undoubted rights invaded by the House of Commons, in their diligent care for the safety of her Majesty's person, in searching after the deeply-laid contrivances of her enemies in the late plot, and in their asserting the liberties and rights of the people of England against the invasion and usurpation of the House of Commons. And, as the Lords were looked upon as the sanctuary and safety of this Nation, so, in the name of the injured Freeholders and Commons of England, their Lordships were assured, that they would firmly adhere to, and faithfully defend their Lordships in the further pursuit of these just and glorious ends." Though there was a great deal of truth in this paper, yet, being represented by the Gloucestershire Justices, at the instigation of Mr. How, to the Queen as of dangerous consequence, a proclamation was published, promising a reward of one hundred pounds for the discovery of the Author, and fifty pounds for apprehending the Printer, which had no effect. Six days after, the Queen, with Prince George, went from St. James's to Windsor, where they passed most part of the summer.

All this while the Scots plot made a great noise, and, accounts of it soon reaching France, about the Frazer was immediately shut up in the Bastille plot. On the other hand, Lindsay, who would discover nothing before the Committee of Lords, was tried upon the act made against corresponding with France, and sentenced to die. Being carried to Tyburn, he was told by the Sheriff, that he must expect no mercy, unless he acknowledged his crime, and discovered what he knew of the conspiracy. But, as it was believed, upon a secret intimation, that he was to be reprieved, he still continued obstinate and mute, and was carried back to Newgate, where he continued prisoner for some years, and then, being banished the Kingdom, he died in Holland in a very miserable condition. The truth is, whether, as some were of opinion, the Ministry found the Queen inclined to favour the friends of the Court of St. Germain's; or whether they themselves were unwilling to irritate the Scots at this critical juncture; it is most certain, that, even after the removal of the Earl of Nottingham, 1703-4. ham, the further discovery of the plot was prosecuted with great tenderness or negligence, as appeared from the following instance. Towards the end of June 1704, Captain Francis Lacan, late of the Lord Galway's regiment of foot in Piedmont, and who, in King James's time, had been an Ensign in Dumbarion's regiment, came over from Holland, and upon oath delivered an information in writing to Mr. Secretary Harley, importing in substance, "That Sir George Maxwell, well, Captain Levingston, Captain Hayes, and several other Scots Officers, who came from the Court of St. Germain's to Holland, near a year and a half before, after having held several private consultations in divers suspicious places in the neighbourhood of the Hague; and Sir George having in vain endeavoured to get a pass from Mr. Stanhope, the Queen's Envoy, they all embark'd for Scotland, to the number of fifteen or sixteen Gentlemen, with three Ladies, the same day that Captain Lacan sailed from the Brill for England, with the retinue of an Envoy from the Duke of Savoy." Mr. Secretary Harley having communicated this information to the Lord-Treasurer, orders were immediately dispatched to Scotland to seize Sir George Maxwell and his followers; which was accordingly done just upon their landing. But though, by what had already appeared before the Committee of the Lords and other concurring evidences, it was plain, that they came with a design to raise commotions in Scotland, yet they were soon after set at liberty; and Sir George Maxwell was not only permitted to come to London, but highly caressed by some great men. As for Captain Lacan, though his information proved so true and exact, that his zeal and diligence were at first greatly extolled, both by the Lord-Treasurer and the Secretary; and though he did further service to the Government, by seizing, in St. James's Park, a young Irish Gentleman, lately a retainer to the Court of St. Germain's; yet, after he had attended daily at the Secretary's Office for above three months, and consumed his small substance, he was sent back to Holland, without any other recompence than empty promises. Nor was this all, for the Irish youth, who to save his life, readily discovered all he knew, and who among other particulars, acquainted Mr. Secretary with the constant correspondence of the Duke of Hamilton with the Court of St. Germain's, was likewise sent to Holland with Lacan upon some idle business, for fear, as it is probable, that he should relate how easily he had escaped, or what little stress was laid on his discoveries. At the same time came over from France, without a pass, one of the daughters of Sir Theophilus Ogletborpe, and, consequently, lay at the mercy of the Government, but was never brought into trouble on that account.

Affairs of Scotland, Burnet. The Duke of Queensberry's management of the plot was so liable to exception, that it was not thought fit to employ him any longer in the Administration of Scotland; and it seems, he had likewise brought himself under the Queen's displeasure; for it had been proposed by some of his friends in the House of Lords, to desire the Queen to communicate to them a letter, which the Duke had wrote to her of such a date. This looked like an examination of the Queen herself, to whom it ought to have been left, to send what letters she thought fit to the House, and they ought not to call for any one in particular. The matter of this letter made him liable to a very severe censure in Scotland; for, in plain words, he charged the majority of the Parliament, as determined in their proceedings by an influence from St. Germain's. This exposed him in Scotland to the fury of a Parliament; for, how true soever this might be, such a representation of a Parliament to the Queen, especially in matters, which could not be proved, was by the laws of that Kingdom, Leefing-making, and a capital crime.

The chief design of the Court, in the Session of Parliament this summer, was to get the Succession of the Crown to be declared, and a supply to be given for the army, which was run into a great arrear. In the debates of the former Session, those, who opposed every thing, more particularly the declaring the Succession, had insisted chiefly on motions to bring their own Constitution to such a settlement, that they might suffer no prejudice by their King's living in England. Mr. James Johnston, who had been Secretary of State for Scotland under King William, was now taken into the administration, and made Lord-Register in the room of Sir James Murray of Philiphaugh. He proposed, in concert with the Marquis of Tweeddale and some others in Scotland, that the Queen should empower her Commissioner to consent to a revival of the whole settlement made by King Charles I. in the year 1641. By that the King named a Privy-Council, and his Ministers of State in Parliament, who had a power to accept of, or to except to the nomination, without being bound to give the reason for excepting to it. In the intervals of Parliament, the King was to give all employments with the consent of the Privy Council. This was the main point of that settlement, which was looked upon by the wisest men of that time as a full security to all their laws and liberties. It did indeed divest the Crown of a great part of the prerogative, and it brought the Parliament into some equality with the Crown. The Queen, upon the representation made to her by her Ministers, offered this as a limitation upon the Successor, in case they would settle the succession, as England had done; and, for doing this, the Marquis of Tweeddale was named her Commissioner. The Queen also signified her pleasure very positively to all, who were employed by her, that she expected they should concur in settling the Succession, as they desired the continuance of her favour. Both the Duke of Marlborough and the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin expressed themselves very fully and positively to the same purpose. Yet it was artfully furnished and spread about by the Jacobites, and too easily believed by jealous and cautious people, that the Court was not sincere in this matter, or at best indifferent as to the success. Some went further, and said, that those, who were in a particular confidence at Court, secretly opposed it, and entered into a management or design to obstruct it. There did not appear any good ground for this suggestion; yet there was matter enough for jealousy to work on, and this was carefully improved by the Jacobites, in order to defeat the design; and 1704. and they were put in hopes, in case of a rupture, to have a considerable force sent to support them from Dunkirk.

The Duke of Queensberry being now laid aside, his colleague, the Earl of Cromarty, remained sole Secretary of State. The Earl of Leven was installed Governor of Edinburgh-castle in the room of the Earl of March, and the Earl of Glasgow removed from the place of Treasurer-Deputy, but his place was not filled.

On the 6th of July, the Parliament being met, the Queen's Commission, appointing the Marquis of Tweeddale to represent her Royal person, was recorded; and, five days after, the Lord-Commissioner presented to them the following letter from her Majesty:

A N N E R.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

Nothing has troubled us more, since our Accession to the Crown of these Realms, than the unsettled state of affairs in that our ancient Kingdom.

We hoped, that the foundations of differences and animosities, that, to our great regret, we discovered among you, did not lie so deep, but that, by the methods we have proceeded in, they might have been removed.

But, instead of success in our endeavours, the rent is become wider. Nay, divisions have proceeded to such a height, as to prove matter of encouragement to our enemies beyond sea to employ their emissaries among you, in order to debauch our good subjects from their allegiance, and to render that our ancient kingdom a scene of blood and disorder, merely, as they speak, to make you serve as a diversion.

But we are willing to hope, that none of our subjects, but such as were obnoxious to the laws for their crimes, or men of low and desperate fortunes, or that are otherwise inconsiderable, have given ear to such pernicious contrivances. And we have no reason to doubt of the assurances given us by those now intrusted with our authority, that they will use their utmost endeavours to convince our people of the advantage and necessity of the present measures. For we have always been inclined to believe, that the late mistakes did not proceed from any want of duty and respect to us, but only from different opinions as to measures of Government.

This being the case, we are resolved, for the full contentment and satisfaction of our people, to grant whatever can, in reason, be demanded for rectifying of abuses, and quieting the minds of all our good subjects.

In order to this, we have named the Marquis of Tweeddale our High-Commissioner, he being a person, of whose capacity and probity, or qualifications and dispositions to serve Us and the Country, neither we nor you can have any doubt. And we have fully empowered him to give you unquestionable proofs of our resolution to maintain the Government, both in Church and State, as by law established, in that our Kingdom; and to consent to such laws, as shall be found wanting for the further security of both, and preventing all encroachments on the same for the future.

Thus, having done our part, we are persuaded, that you will not fail to do yours, but will lay hold on this opportunity to shew the world the sincerity of the professions made to us, and that it was the true love of your Country, and the sense of your duty to it; and therefore not the want of duty to us (for we shall always reckon these two inconsistent) that was at the bottom of the late misunderstandings.

The main thing, that we recommend to you, and which we recommend to you with all the earnestness we are capable of, is the settling of the Succession in the Protestant line, as that which is absolutely necessary for your own peace and happiness, as well as our quiet and security in all our Dominions, and for the reputation of our affairs abroad; and consequently, for the strengthening the Protestant interest every where.

This has been our fixt judgment and resolution ever since we came to the Crown; and, though hitherto opportunities have not answered our intentions, matters are now come to that pass, by the undoubted evidence of the designs of our enemies, that a longer delay of settling the succession in the Protestant line may have very dangerous consequences; and a disappointment of it would infallibly make that our Kingdom the seat of war, and expose it to devastation and ruin.

As to the terms and conditions of Government, with regard to the Successor, we have empowered our Commissioner to give the Royal assent to whatever can, in reason, be demanded, and is in our power to grant, for securing the Sovereignty and Liberties of that our ancient Kingdom.

We are now in a war, which makes it necessary to provide for the defence of the Kingdom; the time of the funds, that were lately given for maintenance of the land-forces, being expired, and the said funds exhausted, provision ought also to be made for supplying the magazines with arms and ammunition, and repairing the forts and castles, and for the charge of the frigates, that prove so useful for guarding the coasts.

We earnestly recommend to you whatever may contribute to the advancement of true piety, and discouragement of vice and immorality; and, we doubt not, but you will take care to encourage trade, and improve the product and manufactories of the Nation, in all which, and every thing else, that can be for the good and happiness of our people, you shall have our hearty and ready concurrence. We shall only add, that unanimity and moderation in all your proceedings will be of great use for bringing to a happy issue the important affairs, that we have laid before you, and will be also most acceptable to us. So we bid you heartily farewell.

Given at our Court at Windsor-Castle, the 25th day of June 1704, and of our Reign the third year.

The Queen's letter was seconded by the speeches of the High-Commissioner and Lord-Chancellor, all tending to the settling the Succession, which 1704. which was the first debate (1). A great party was now wrought on, when they understood that the settlement of 1641 was to be offered them. For the wisest Patriots in that Kingdom had always magnified that Constitution, as the best contrived scheme that could be desired: So they went in, with great zeal, to the accepting of it. But those who, in the former Session, had rejected all the motions of treating with England with some scorn, and had made this their constant topic, that they must, in the first place, secure their own Constitution at home, and then they might trust the rest to time, and to such accidents, as time might bring forth; now when they saw that every thing, that could be desired, was offered with relation to their own Government; they (being resolved to oppose any declaration of the Succession, what terms soever might be granted to obtain it) turned the argument wholly another way; to shew the necessity of a previous treaty with England. They were upon that told, that the Queen was ready to grant them every thing, that was reasonable, with relation to their own Constitution, yet, without the concurrence of the Parliament of England, she could grant nothing, in which England was concerned; for they were for demanding a share of the Plantation-trade, and that their ships might be comprehended within the act of navigation.

Pursuant to the scheme of a treaty before the Succession was fixed, the Duke of Hamilton presented a resolve, "That this Parliament would not proceed to name a Successor to the Crown, until the Scots had a previous treaty with England, in relation to commerce and other concerns." The Courtiers, not expecting the Cavaliers would have begun so early to oppose the Succession, were not a little surprized and perplexed at this resolve, and all they could do for the present was to procure a vote, that it should lie on the table till the next meeting four days after. The Duke of Hamilton having then moved the resuming of the consideration of his resolve, it occasioned a warm debate, in which Fletcher of Salton, in a particular manner, represented the hardships and miseries, which the Scots had suffered since the union of the two Crowns under one Sovereign, and the impossibility of bettering their condition, unless they took care to prevent any design, that tended to continue the same. Upon this, the Earl of Rothes presented another resolve, "That this Parliament would immediately proceed to make such limitations and conditions of Government, as might be judged proper for rectifying the Constitution, and to vindicate and secure the Sovereignty and Independency of the Nation; and then the Parliament would take into consideration the other resolve offered by the Duke of Hamilton for a treaty, previous to the nomination of a Successor to the Crown." This occasioned a new debate, wherein the Court-party earnestly urged the settling the Succession, before the House proceeded to any other business; and, on the other hand, the Cavaliers made very sharp reflections on the proceedings of the Parliament of England, with relation to the Plot, which had great influence on many Members wholly unacquainted with that affair. However, the Court-party, thinking they were strong enough to give the Earl of Rothes's motion the preference to the Duke of Hamilton's resolve, insisted to have the question stated, Which of the two should come first under the consideration of the House? Upon which, great heats arose, and Sir James Falconer of Plesko spoke to this purpose, "That he was very glad to see such an emulation in the House, upon account of the Nation's interest and security: That he thought both the resolves under their consideration so good and necessary, that it was pity they should clash with one another; he therefore moved, that it be resolved, that this Parliament will not proceed to the nomination of a Successor, until there was a previous treaty with England, for regulating the commerce and other affairs with that Nation: And, that this Parliament will proceed to make such limitations and conditions of Government, as may secure the Religion, Liberty, and Independency of this Nation, before they proceed to the nomination of a Successor to the Crown." This joint resolve being put to the vote, it was carried by a majority of fifty-five voices. Of these, about thirty were in immediate dependence on the Court, and were determined according to directions given them. However, they went no farther in this vote for a treaty with England; for they could not agree among themselves who should be the Commissioners, and those, who opposed the declaring the Succession, were concerned for no more, when that affair was laid aside. It was therefore postponed, as a matter about which they took no farther care.

The Cavaliers were extremely elated by this victory; and the Duke of Athol, Lord Privy-Seal, and one of their Leaders, moved, "That her Majesty having been pleased to signify by her Commissioner, that the examination of the plot should be laid before the Parliament, his Grace would be pleased to write to her Majesty, to send down the persons, who were witnesses, and all the papers relating to that plot, as soon as possible, that the affair might be thoroughly examined; and those, who were unjustly accused, might be vindicated, and the guilty punished." Whereupon the Lord-Chancellor declared, by order of the Lord-Commissioner, that his Grace had written, and would write again to the Queen, for all the evidences relating to the plot. Two July 1. days after, the Duke of Hamilton moved, "That the Parliament would proceed to make such limitations and conditions of Government, for the rectifying of the Constitution, as might secure the Religion, Liberty, and Independency of this Nation; and that they would

(1) The Earl of Cromarty made also a strange speech (which was printed) running into a distinction among Divines, between the revealed and secret will of God, shewing, that no such distinction could be applied to the Queen; she had but one will, and that was revealed: But, notwithstanding this speech, it was still suspected, that at least her Ministers had a secret will in this case.

1704. "would name Commissioners to treat with England, for regulating the commerce, and other concerns with that Nation, previous to all other business, except an act for two months cefs, first of all to be granted for the present subsistence of her Majesty's forces." Upon this, the Earl of Marchmont made a long speech, importing, "That, since the House had resolved not to fall immediately upon settling the Succession, it was reasonable, that an act should be made to exclude all Popish Successors." To which the Duke of Hamilton answered, "That he should be one of the first, who should draw his sword against a Popish Successor, though he did not think this a proper time, either to settle the Succession, or to consider of the Earl of Marchmont's proposal." After some debate, the consideration of the Duke of Hamilton's motion was adjourned for two days, when it was moved That the act presented by the Lord Justice Clark, and declared by him to be for fourteen months supply, payable in two years, might likewise be considered. After a debate, it was put to the vote, Whether to give a cefs for two, or for fourteen months? And, it was carried by sixteen voices, that it should be for two months only. The act of Supply was, four days after, taken again into consideration; but there was tacked to it a great part of the bill for the Security of the Nation, which (as hath been related) passed the former Session of Parliament, but was refused by the Throne*. After some debate, the following resolve was offered by the Lord Rofs, "That the Parliament will proceed to grant two months supply for subsisting her Majesty's forces; and, as soon as the act of Security, now read, has got the Royal assent, will give four months more." And then a second resolve was presented by the Earl of Roxburgh, "That there be a first reading marked on the act of Security; and that both this act, and that for the Supply, lie, without being further proceeded on, until her Majesty's Commissioner receive instructions as to the act of Security, it being then free for the Parliament to proceed to the acts jointly or separately, as they should think fit." After reasoning on both these resolves, the question was stated, Whether to approve the Lord Rofs's or the Earl of Roxburgh's? It was carried for the Lord Rofs's; and the act of Security being read, a first reading was ordered to be marked thereon. These things were carried with great heat and vehemence; for (as was before observed) a national humour of being independent on England fermented so strongly among all sorts of people without doors, that those, who went not into every hot motion that was made, were considered as the Betrayers of their Country: And they were so exposed to a popular fury, that some of those, who studied to stop the torrent, were thought to be in danger of their lives. The Presbyterians were so overawed with these proceedings, that, though they wished well to the settling the Succession, they durst not openly declare it. The Dukes of Hamilton and Arbol led all these violent motions, and the whole Nation was strangely inflamed.

The Ministers were in great perplexity how to act, with regard to the Supply bill, and the tack, that was joined to it. If it was denied, the army could be no longer kept up; they had run so far in arrear, that, considering the poverty of the Country, that could not be carried on much longer. Some suggested, that it should be proposed to the English Ministry to advance the subsistence-money, till better measures could be taken; but none of the Scots Ministers would agree to that. An army is reckoned to belong to those, who pay it; and therefore an army, paid from England, would be called an English army. Nor was it possible to manage such a thing secretly. It was well known that there was no money in the Scots Treasury to pay them; so that, if money were once brought into the Treasury how secretly soever, all men must conclude, that it came from England. And men's minds were then so full of the conceit of Independency, that, if a suspicion arose of any such practice, probably it would have occasioned tumults. Even the army itself was so inflamed with this temper, that it was believed, that neither officers nor soldiers would have taken their pay, if they had believed it came from England. The affair was therefore reduced to this dilemma, that either the army must be disbanded, or the bill must pass. It is true, the army was a very small one, not above three thousand; but it was so ordered, that it was double or treble officered; so that it could have been easily increased to a much greater number, if there had been occasion for it. The Officers had served long, and were men of a good character. Since therefore there were alarms of an invasion, which both sides looked for, and the intelligence, which the Court had from France, assured them it was intended; the Ministers thought the inconveniencies arising from the tack might be remedied afterwards; but that the breaking of the army was such a pernicious thing, and might end so fatally, that it was not to be ventured on. Therefore, by common consent, a letter was wrote to the Queen, which was signed by all the Ministers in Scotland, in which they laid the whole matter before her, and every thing stated and balanced; concluding with their humble advice to pass the bill. This was very heavy on the Lord Godolphin, on whose counsel the Queen chiefly relied. He saw, that the ill consequences of breaking the army, and laying that Kingdom open to an invasion, would fall on him, if he should, in contradiction to the advice given by the Ministry of Scotland, have advised the Queen to reject the bill. This was under consideration in the end of July, when affairs abroad were in a great uncertainty; for though the victory at Sebelburg was a good step, yet the great decision was not then come. He thought therefore, considering the state of affairs, and the accidents, which might happen, that it was the safest thing for the Queen to comply with the advice of those to whom she trusted the affairs of that Kingdom. The Queen sent orders to pass the bill, which being done, Aug. 5. the Commissioner made the following speech on the occasion.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"AT your sitting down, her Majesty, in her gracious letter, recommended to you two things, which she thought most necessary

1704. "sary for your own quiet and security, as well "as for that of her Government; the settling "of the Succession in the Protestant line, and "the providing for the subsistence of the forces,
 "the funds last given for that end being then "exhausted. The first of these you have not "thought fit for your interest to do at this "time. I heartily wish you may meet with an "opportunity for it more for your advantage
 "at another. The other all of you seemed "most ready and willing to go into, as witness
 "the several motions and resolves made there-
 "anent; but, withal, shewed strong inclinations
 "for an act of Security, as absolutely necessary.
 "I told you then, as I had done at first, that I "had been fully impowered and instructed, not "only as to that, but many other things for "your good; but, upon the alteration of cir"cumstances, had not now the liberty to make "use of those powers even as to that, till I had "acquainted her Majesty, and knew her mind,
 "which I would do, and use my utmost interest
 "to procure it favourable; which was the true "reason of your long adjournment, and not "what was insinuated by some, who ought to "have known me better, the character I have "in the world being, as I hope, above so mean
 "a reflection.

"And now, my Lords and Gentlemen, I "can tell you, that, from her Majesty's innate "goodness and gracious disposition towards
 "you, it hath been more easy for me and some "other of her servants to prevail with her,
 "than perhaps was by others expected; so that "you have an act of Security sufficient for the "ends proposed. And it is hoped, at the same "time, you will perfect that of Supply, which "you yourselves seem convinced to be absolute"ly necessary at this time, and without which "neither the forces can be kept on foot, nor "any frigate maintained for guarding our coasts
 "and securing our trade; both which now lying "before you, I hope you will go presently "about, that, when finished, they may have the "Royal assent, which I am ready to give.
 "And therefore you may have time to proceed "to other business relating to trade, or your "other concerns, wherein I shall be willing to "comply with your desires, so they be within "the bounds of my instructions.

Thus this act of Security was passed after the battle of Blenheim was over, but several days before the news of it reached England. When the act passed, copies of it were sent to England, where it was soon printed by those, who were uneasy at the Lord Gadolphin's holding the white staff, and resolved to make use of this against him; for the whole blame of passing it was cast upon him (1). It was not possible to prove, that he had advised the Queen to it, and therefore some took it by another handle, 1704.

 and resolved to urge it against him, that he had not persuaded the Queen to reject it, though that seemed a great stretch; for, he being a stranger to Scotland, it might have been liable to more objection, if he had presumed to advise the Queen to refuse a bill passed in the Parliament of that Kingdom, which all the Ministry there advised her to pass. Severe censures were passed upon this act. It was said, that the two Kingdoms were now divided by law, and that the Scots were putting themselves in a posture to defend it; and all saw by whose advices this was done. One thing, which contributed to keep up an ill humour in the Parliament of Scotland, was more justly imputed to him.
 The Queen had promised to send down to them all the examinations relating to the plot.
 If these had been sent down, probably in the first heat the matter might have been carried far against the Duke of Queensberry. But he, who stayed all the while in London, got it to be represented to the Queen, that the sending down these examinations, with the persons concerned in them, would run the Session into so much heat, and into such a length, that it would divert them quite from considering the Succession, and it might produce a tragical scene. Upon these suggestions, the Queen altered her resolution of sending them down; and though repeated applications were made to her, both by the Parliament and her Ministers, to have them sent, yet no answer was made to these, nor was so much as an excuse made for not sending them. The Duke of Queensberry, having gained this point, got all his friends to join with the party, that opposed the new Ministry.
 This both defeated all their projects, and fos-tened the spirits of those, who were so set against him, that in their first fury no stop could have been put to their proceedings. But now the party, that had designed to ruin him, was so much wrought on by the assistance, that his friends gave them in this Session, that they resolved to preserve him.

The Parliament having granted a six months cess for the pay of the army, they were entering upon debates about the plot and the proceedings of the English House of Lords in that affair, as an undue intermeddling with their concerns, and an encroachment upon the Sovereignty and Independence of their Nation, when the High-Commissioner told them, that he was not allowed to give them any more time, but that they should soon have another opportunity of doing what still remained to be done;
 for no disappointment, her Majesty had met with, could alter, in the least, her favourable dispositions towards that her ancient Kingdom.
 After which, the Parliament was prorogued to the 7th of October. However, before they separated

Aug. 27.

(1) This act was in substance much the same with that to which the Duke of Queensberry had refused the Royal assent. By the act it was provided, that, if the Queen should die without issue, a Parliament should presently meet, and they were to declare the Successor to the Crown, who should not be the same person, that was possessed of the Crown of England, unless before that time there should be a Settlement made in Parliament, of the rights and liberties of the Nation, independent on English Councils. By another clause in the act, it was made lawful to arm the subjects, and to train them and put them in a posture of defence.

 This was chiefly pressed, in behalf of the best-affected in the Kingdom, who were not armed; for the Highlanders, who were the worst-affected, were well armed; so, to balance that, it was moved, that leave should be given to arm the rest.

(1) However

1704. parated, they drew up an address to the Queen, desiring, that the evidence and papers, relating to the plot, might be laid before them against the next Session.

This was the state of that Nation, which was aggravated very odiously all over England. It was confidently, though, as was afterwards known, very falsely reported, that great quantities of arms were brought over, and dispersed through the whole Kingdom. And, it being well known, how poor the Nation was at that time, it was said, those arms were paid for by other hands, in imitation of what it was believed Cardinal Richelieu did in the year 1638. Another thing was given out very maliciously by the Lord Godolphin's enemies, that he had given directions under-hand, to hinder the declaring the Succession; and that the secret of this was trusted to Mr. Johnson, who, they said, talked openly one way, and acted secretly another, though there never appeared any colour of truth in those reports. Great use was to be made of the affairs of Scotland, because there was no ground of complaint of any thing in the administration at home. All the Duke of Marlborough's enemies saw, that his chief strength lay in the credit which the Lord Godolphin was in at home, while he was so successful abroad; so that, it being impossible to attack him in such a course of glory, they laid their aims against the Lord-Treasurer. The Tories resolved to attack him, and that disposed the Whigs to preserve him; and this was so managed by them, that it gave a great turn to all the Councils at home.

Changes in the Scots Ministry. Immediately after the adjournment of the Parliament, the Courtiers repaired to London, where the Marquis of Tweeddale was made Chancellor of Scotland; the Earls of Seafield and Roxburgh, Secretaries of State; the Earl of Rothes, Lord-Privy-Seal; the Earl of Cromarty, Justice-General; Mr. Bailie of Jervis-wood, Treasurer-Deputy; and the Earl of Selkirk, Lord Belhaven, and Sir John Hume, Lords of the Treasury; Sir William Hamilton was also made Justice-Clerk; but he lived not to enjoy that office many months, and was succeeded by Adam Cockburn of Ormiston. A new Commission was, at the same time, sent down to Edinburgh, by which most of the Cavaliers, and all the Duke of Queensberry's friends, were laid aside, and it was made up entirely of Scots Revolutioners. And thus the administration of affairs in Scotland was lodged in the hands of a body of men, who concurred with the measures at that time pursued by the Court of England. It is now time to turn to the operations of the war.

The affairs of the Empire were in the beginning of this campaign in a very desperate condition. The Emperor was reduced to the last extremities. The Elector of Bavaria was Master of the Danube as far as Passau, and the Malecontents in Hungary were making a formidable progress. The Emperor was not in a condition to maintain a defensive war long on both sides, nor was he able to make any opposition at all against them, should they once come to act by concert. Thus his affairs had a very gloomy appearance, and utter ruin was to be apprehended. Vienna was in apparent danger of being besieged on both sides, and it was not capable of making a long defence; so that the House of Austria seemed lost beyond all prospect of a recovery. Prince Eugene wisely proposed, that the Emperor should implore the protection of the Queen of Great Britain, which was agreed to, and Count Wratislaw managed the affair at the Court of England with great application and secrecy (1). The Duke of Marlborough saw the necessity of undertaking the Emperor's relief, and resolved to use all possible endeavours to put it in execution. When he went into Holland in the winter, he proposed it to the Pensionary, and other persons of the greatest confidence. They approved it, but it was not advisable to propose it to the States, since at that time many would not have thought their Country safe, if their army should be sent so far from them; and nothing could be long a secret, which was proposed to such an Assembly, whereas the main hope of succeeding in this design

(1) However for form sake, and to prepare the way for the reception of a resolution, that had been already taken, Wratislaw presented the following memorial to the Queen, on the 2d of April:

"That he had several times represented to her Majesty's Ministers, by word of mouth, the pressing necessities of the Empire, by the breaking in of a considerable army of French into Bavaria; which (together with the insurrection in Hungary) had reduced the Imperial Hereditary Countries to an incredible perplexity and confusion; so that it was to be feared, that an entire revolution and desolation of all Germany would follow, if some speedy assistance were not applied, proportionable to the great dangers they were threatened with. He was indeed extremely well satisfied with the zeal, which her Majesty's Ministers had for the common cause, and with the attention they gave to his representations. But nothing being as yet resolved on, though the season was far advanced; and the final resolution on the several schemes, which had been presented, being deferred till the arrival of the Duke of Marlborough at the Hague; he thought himself obliged, before his Grace's departure, to do his utmost endeavour, by representing in writing the danger,

No. 42. VOL. III.

"wherein the Emperor and Empire were at present involved. That her Majesty out of the same zeal for preserving the liberties of Europe, for which she was so much famed, would be pleased to order the Duke of Marlborough, her Captain-General, seriously to consult with the States-General, concerning the speediest method for assisting the Empire; or, at least, to conduct part of the troops in her Majesty's pay beyond the sea, to preserve Germany from a total subversion; it not being just in itself, nor any ways advantageous to the common cause, that her Majesty's troops should continue on the frontiers of Holland, which were not in the least threatened by the enemy, and were defended by great rivers and strong places; whilst the Empire was destroyed by the French troops with fire and sword." In conclusion Count Wratislaw declared, "That the representations he had made were grounded on the Alliance concluded between the Emperor, England, and Holland; pursuant to which, he hoped, her Majesty would give such orders, as were necessary for the Assistance of Germany, by the want of which he foresaw the mischiefs, that would arise to the common cause, especially if the orders of the States-General to recall their troops from the Empire should take place, at a time, when France endeavoured 1304. sign lay in the secrecy, with which it was conducted. Therefore, under the pretext of carrying the war to the Moselle, every thing was prepared, that was necessary for executing the true design.

The Duke of Marlborough arrives in Holland. April 21. N. S. Brodrick. Conduct of the Duke of Marlborough.

The Duke of Marlborough, with his brother General Churchill, Lieutenant-General Lumley, the Earl of Orkney, and other General Officers, embarked for Holland, and, in three days, arrived at the Hague. Two days after his coming, he was attended by a solemn deputation of the States, in order to confer with him. The Conference lasted six hours. The chief subject of debate was about sending a good army towards the Moselle. This was all that was proposed in public, and to this the States of Zealand, and two other Provinces, strongly objected. They would not agree, that the Duke should have an unlimited command to lead the army where he pleased, and thought it a very dangerous project to march the troops at so great a distance. The Zealand Deputies opposed it so strenuously, that the Duke was obliged to tell them plainly, that he had the Queen's positive orders to march with the troops in her pay towards the Moselle.

The Duke of Marlborough's march into Germany. May 5. May 10.

Accordingly, having taken his leave of the States, the Duke set out from Holland, and, in five days, arrived at Maastricht, where his army was incamped. About the same time, the States regulated the posts of their General Officers. Monsieur Auverquerque, their Field-Marshal, was appointed to command their forces on the Meuse, having under him the Counts de Tilly and Noyelles; Slangenburg those on the Moselle; Salische in Brabant; and Spaar and Fogel in Flanders.

May 18.

From Maastricht the Duke of Marlborough marched to Bedburg, and, his camp being near Cologne, he was waited on by the Canons of that Chapter, the Prince of Saxe-Zeits, Bishop of Roan, the Prince of Hesse, Count Briançon, the Duke of Savoy's Envoy to the Queen of England, and other Princes and Generals.

The French endeavour to stop his march.

The French in Flanders began by this time to be alarmed, though they were far from suspecting the Duke's real design. His marching towards Coblentz, and the great preparations, which were making in that place, made them believe, that he designed to open the campaign with the siege of Traarbach, and endeavour to advance along the Moselle into France. Upon this supposition they detached five thousand foot, and two thousand horse towards that river, and gave out, that they intended the siege of Huy; vainly imagining, that, by this report, they might stop the progress of the English General. But the Duke, well knowing that the forces, which were left in Flanders under Auverquerque, were sufficient to frustrate any attempt, which the French could make on that side, continued his march, and advanced from Bedburg to Kerpenerd,

May 20.

The next day to Kalscheek, where he received an express from Prince Lewis of Baden, with some intercepted letters, by which it appeared, that the French intended to force their passage thro' the Black Forest, and, after joining the Bavarians; to march directly to Vienna. About the same time, the Duke received advice from the Netherlands, that the Court of France had sent positive orders to Villeroy, to march towards the Moselle with five and thirty battalions, and six and forty squadrons, being still firmly persuaded, that the Duke would act on that side. Upon this, the Duke gave immediate orders for his forces to march with all expedition; and whilst the army was on a full march, he went to take a view of the fortifications of Bonne, where, having given his directions to the Governor of that place, he returned in the evening to the army. Here he received certain advice, that the recruits for the French army in Bavaria, with farther reinforcements, had joined the Elector three days before at Villingen. But the Duke, notwithstanding this junction of the enemies, was, on account of the number of the troops, which the French left behind them, and by the Marshal's marching back with the rest of his army towards the Rhine, confirmed in his opinion, that the enemies were as yet wholly ignorant of his design. He therefore continued his march with unwearied diligence, and advanced to the camp of Neudorf near Coblentz, where, besides Mr. Devenant, the Queen's Agent at Frankfort, and Monsieur d'Amelo, Envoy Extraordinary from the States-General, Count Wratisslaw, in his return from London, waited on him, to settle all things for his farther march, and his conjunction with the Imperial army. Then the Duke passed the Neckar near Ladenburg, where he rested three days. Having, by this time, gained the advance of some days of the French army, he wrote to the States from Ladenburg, to let them know that he had the Queen's order to march to the relief of the Empire, with which he hoped they would agree, and allow his carrying their troops to share in the honour of that expedition. He had their answer as quick as the Courier could bring it, by which they approved of the design, and of his carrying their troops with him. So he had now the whole army at his own disposal.

The French imagining that he would advance to the Upper Rhine, Villeroy marched thither with all possible speed; and, at the same time, a detachment of seven battalions and twenty-one squadrons, from the Confederate army in Flanders, under the Duke of Wurtemberg, followed the Duke of Marlborough, who marched from Ladenburg to Mildenheim, where, the next day, Prince Eugene paid him a visit. The consultations between the Prince and the Duke lasted several hours; and it was agreed upon, that

"voured to send a powerful assistance to their army
"in Bavaria."

To this memorial the Queen was pleased to return an answer, importing, "That she had given directions to the Duke of Marlborough, to take the most effectual methods with the States-General of the United Provinces, her good Allies and Confederates, to send a speedy relief to his Imperial Majesty and

"the Empire, and to press the States to take the necessary measures to rescue Germany from the imminent danger, to which it was now exposed." Lamberti III.

It is said the Duke of Marlborough communicated his project at first only to the Queen, Prince George, and the Treasurer, and in Holland only to the Pensionary and Deputy Geldermallen.

(1) Prince

1704. the two armies should join, and the Duke and Prince Lewis of Baden should command each day alternately, and that Prince Eugene should go upon the Rhine, to command a separate army. The troops being drawn up in order of battle, the Duke accompanied Prince Eugene to a review, when the Prince seemed wonderfully pleased to find them in such excellent order after so long a march (1). The next day, Prince Lewis of Baden arrived in the camp at Great Heppach, where a Conference was held in the evening. The day following, the troops marched from Great Heppach, and Prince Lewis went to his army on the Danube, and Prince Eugene rid post for Philipsburg, to command the army on the Rhine; and, on the 22d, joined Prince Lewis of Baden at Wafterstet. On the 24th, the army marched from thence to Elchingen; the next day to Gingen. On the 30th, the army marched from thence to Landshausen on the right, and Balmersbussen on the left, and passed so near the enemy's camp, that Lieutenant-General Bulau was sent out the night before with a detachment of two thousand horse and dragoons, to secure the avenues, by which they might have disturbed the march of the Allies, who, by this means, proceeded without any opposition. On the 1st of July, they continued their march in sight of the enemy's intrenchments at Dillingen, and incamped the night at Amerdighen, and the left at Onderingen.

The battle
of Schellenberg.

While they lay in this camp, the Duke received advice, that the Elector of Bavaria had sent the best of his infantry to reinforce Count d'Arco, who was posted at Schellenberg, a rising ground on the Danube, near Donawert, where, for several days, he had caused some thousands of men to work upon intrenchments, as being a post of vast importance. The Duke resolved to march and attack the enemy; and the necessary directions being given to the army, on the 2d of July, early in the morning, he advanced with a detachment of thirty squadrons of English and Dutch, a considerable number of foot commanded by Lieutenant-General Goor, three battalions of Imperial Grenadiers under Prince Lewis of Baden, and the rest of the army followed with all possible diligence. But the march being long, and the ways very bad, they could not reach the river Wermitz, which runs by Donawert, till about noon, and it was three hours before the bridges were finished, for the troops and cannon to pass over. About five o'clock in the afternoon, they came before Schellenberg, and the Duke of Marlborough moved up with the horse as near the enemy's intrenchments, as was necessary to take a view of them. In the mean time, the artillery began to fire upon the enemy, who answered briskly from their batteries for about an hour; when the English and Dutch foot, supported by the horse and dragoons, began the attack with prodigious resolution, before the Imperialists could arrive; but, having the greatest part of the enemy's forces to contend with, they were at first obliged to give ground. Soon after the Imperialists came up very seasonably, and, being led on in good order by Prince Lewis of Baden, advanced to the enemy's works without once firing, threw their fascines into the ditch, and passed over with inconsiderable loss. The enemy's horse charged them vigorously, but were repulsed; and then, the Imperial cavalry entering their intrenchments, and the English and Dutch breaking in about the same time, the Confederates made a dreadful slaughter of the enemy. Lieutenant-General Goor, who commanded the first detachment of foot, and Major-General Beinheim, both in the Dutch service, lost their lives very much lamented. The horse and dragoons shared the glory of the day with the infantry; and all the Confederate troops behaved themselves with incredible bravery and resolution. But, as the attack was begun by a battalion of the English foot-guards, and the regiments of Orkney and Ingoldby, they suffered very much. The enemy's forces consisted of thirty-two thousand men, all choice troops, commanded in chief by Count d'Arco, and under him by two Bavarian and two French Lieutenant-Generals. As soon as the Confederates had possessed the intrenchments, the enemy ran away in great confusion to Donawert and the Danube; but, being closely pursued by the horse and dragoons, a great many followed the example of their Generals, who saved themselves by swimming over that river. The loss of the enemy was computed to be about six thousand Men. The Confederates made themselves masters of sixteen pieces of cannon, thirteen colours, with all their tents and baggage. The Duke of Marlborough gained great honour in this action, giving directions with extraordinary presence of mind, and exposing his person to the greatest danger. Prince Lewis of Baden was wounded, having performed the part of a brave experienced General; as was also the Hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel, who, throughout the whole action, gave signal proofs of an undaunted courage. Count Stirum was mortally wounded. General Thungen, Count Horn, Lieutenant-General Wood, Major-General Paland, and several other officers of distinction, were likewise wounded. The next day, the Bavarian garrison quitted Donawert (2), upon the approach of the Confederates, and broke down the bridges; but had not time to destroy their ammunition and provisions, as they had intended.

The Elector of Bavaria was no sooner informed of the defeat of his troops at Schellenberg, than he quitted his strong camp between Dillingen and Lavingen, and came to the other side of the Danube, over-against Donawert, in his march to the river Leche, to prevent the Confederates cutting off his retreat to his Country.

On the 5th of July, the Duke of Marlborough passed the Danube near Donawert; and, on the 17th, Count de Frise, with a detachment of four 1704. four thousand men and twelve pieces of cannon, marched over the river Lech, and took post in the country of Bavaria. The whole army marched at the same time, and incamped with the right at Hamber, and the left at Gunderkingen. Upon the first notice of the Allies having begun to pass the Lech, the garrison of Neuburg marched out, and retired to Ingoldstadt. Whereupon, a detachment of dragoons was immediately sent out by the Duke of Marlborough, to take possession of that place; and Prince Lewis of Baden ordered General Herberville, who commanded a separate body of between three and four thousand men on the other side of the Danube, to remain there, for the security of that important place, and for the drawing of provisions out of Franconia, for the subsistence of the Confederate troops, while they continued in Bavaria. On the 10th, the whole army passed the Lech; and, on the 13th, Count Vecklen, General of the Palatine horse, arrived from Prince Eugene of Savoy with an account, that the Marshals Villeroy and Tallard had passed the Rhine above fort Kehl, in order to succour the Elector of Bavaria; for which reason he desired a reinforcement of horse, to inable him the better to observe the enemy's motions. Upon which, Prince Maximilian of Hanover was detached with thirty squadrons of Imperial horse, with orders to join Prince Eugene with all possible diligence.

Rain surrenders to the Allies.

The enemy having left a garrison at Rain (1), the Confederate Generals resolved to attack it; and, in order thereto, the army decamped from Gunderkingen, passed the Lech, and came with the right to Stauda, and the left to Berchheim. The garrison at first seemed resolved to defend the place to the last extremity; but, the Besiegers playing upon the town with twenty-seven pieces of cannon, their approaches were carried on so successfully, that in two days the Governor desired to capitulate; and, the articles being agreed on, the garrison marched out the next day, to the number of about four hundred foot, commanded by the Count de Mercy, Brigadier-General, and were conducted by a party of horse to the Elector of Bavaria's camp near Augsburg. There were found in the place twenty-four brass cannon, a considerable quantity of provisions, and some ammunition. The Allies, encouraged by the success of their arms, were willing to push their advantages; and, on the 18th, marched to attack the post of Aicha, which had a garrison of eight or nine hundred Bavarians; who, refusing to submit, were part of them put to the sword, the rest made prisoners of war, and the town permitted to be plundered by the soldiers. The Confederate army having refreshed themselves two days at Aicha, marched from thence on the 21st, and the next day possessed themselves of Friburg.

Burnet.

The Duke of Marlborough, having now the Elector of Bavaria at so great a disadvantage, entered upon a treaty with him, and offered him what terms he could desire, either for himself or his brother, even to the paying him the whole charge of the war, upon condition that he would immediately break with the French, 1704. and send his army into Italy to join with the Imperialists there. The Elector's subjects, who were now at mercy, pressed him vehemently to accept of these terms; and he seemed inclined to hearken to them, and Messengers went often between the two armies. But this was done only to gain time, for he sent Courier after Courier with most pressing instances to hasten the advance of the French army. When he saw, that he could gain no more time, the matter went so far, that articles were ordered to be made ready for signing, which, in conclusion, he refused to do. This refusal was highly resented by the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Lewis of Baden, who immediately sent out the Count de la Tour, General of the Imperial horse, and the Count of Ess-Frisland, Lieutenant-General in the Dutch service, with thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons, to plunder and burn the Country of Bavaria as far as Munich, the Capital City, hoping, that either a generous compassion for his subjects, or the want of subsistence, would conquer the Elector's obstinacy. In the mean time, the inhabitants of these parts were in the greatest consternation, and sent Deputies to the Duke of Marlborough, offering to pay large contributions to prevent military execution. But the Duke replied, "That the forces of the Queen of Great-Britain were not come into Bavaria to get money, but to bring their Prince to reason." The two Generals therefore put their Commission in execution with the utmost severity, while the Elector of Bavaria and the Marshal de Marsin, having evacuated Ratisbon, were obliged to confine themselves within their strong camp and intrenchments at Augsburg, in expectation of another army from France under Marshal Tallard, which, notwithstanding all the vigilance and precaution of Prince Eugene, arrived before the end of July at Biberach near Ulm, to the number of about twenty-two thousand men. Upon this, the Elector marched with his army from Augsburg, and took that opportunity to join the French.

The Confederate army, under the Duke of Marlborough, having intelligence of these proceedings, decamped on the 4th of August from Friburg, and marched that night to Kippach.

The next morning they encamped from thence, and marched to Hohenwert, where they continued two days. During that time, the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, and Prince Lewis of Baden held a Council of war; wherein it was agreed, that Prince Lewis should besiege Ingoldstadt, whilst the other two were to observe the Elector of Bavaria. On the 8th, the army under the Duke of Marlborough marched from Hohenwert to St. San-Kitzel; and, on the 9th, from thence to Axheim; and, at the same time, Prince Lewis went another way, and bent his march directly to Neuburg, in order to invest Ingoldstadt. The same day, the Duke of Marlborough received advice, that the enemy had passed part of their army over the Danube, at Levingen: Whereupon he ordered General 1704. Churchill to march with a strong detachment over that river at Schonevelt; to reinforce, Prince Eugene, who lay incamped near Donawert. The 10th, they marched to Schonevelt; and, the day following, intelligence was brought, that the enemy's troops had all got over the Danube; so that the Duke of Marlborough immediately ordered his army to march by break of day, and pass that river likewise; which was performed accordingly, and, at night, the whole army, being rejoined, incamped at Munster. On the 12th, very early in the morning, the Generals of the Allies went to view the enemy's army, taking with them all the piquet guard, which consisted of twenty-eight squadrons. The Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene went up to the top of a tower called Tbiffingen, that they might the better observe the posture of the enemy; and they took notice, that their advanced squadrons, which were in motion towards the Allies, stopped short, after they had perceived them. They were possessed of a very advantageous post, on a hill near Hochstet (1), their right flank being covered by the Danube, and the village of Blenheim (2), and the left by the village of Luzzenen; and they had a rivulet before them, whose banks were very high, and the bottom marshy. However, after some consultation, it was thought proper to fall upon the enemy, before they had time to fortify themselves in that post. The Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene saw the danger of being forced to lie idle in their own camp, till their forage should be consumed, and their provisions spent. They had also intercepted letters from Marshal Villeroy to the Elector of Bavaria, by which it appeared, that he had orders to march into Wirtemberg, to destroy that Country, and to cut off the communication with the Rhine, which must have been fatal to the Allies. The necessary dispositions were therefore made for the next morning's action. Many of the General Officers came and represented to the Duke of Marlborough the difficulties of the design; he answered, That he saw these well, but the thing was absolutely necessary; so they were sent to give orders every where, which were received all over the army with an alacrity, that gave a happy presage of the success which followed.

Battle of Hochstet.
Brodrick. On the 13th of August, a day, which decided the Elector's fate by the loss of all his Country, early in the morning, the whole Confederate army marched from Munster, leaving their tents standing; and the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, having posted themselves on a rising ground, summoned all the General Officers, to give them the necessary directions, in order to attack the enemy; upon which, the army advanced to the plain, and were drawn up in order of battle. About nine o'clock, the enemy fired some cannon upon our troops, as they were marching to form the line, who were answered from our batteries with good success; and both armies continued cannonading each other till near one; during which time, the Duke of Marlborough ordered a little rivulet, and morass in the front of the enemy to be founded; and, where it was found impassable, orders were given to the horse of the second line of the Allies to provide themselves, each squadron within twenty fascines, to facilitate the passage. These preparations being made, the Duke of Marlborough gave orders for a general attack, which was begun about one o'clock. Prince Eugene and the Imperial General Officers were on the right: General Churchill, the Lord Cutts, Lieutenant-General Lamley, the Lord Orkney, and Lieutenant-General Ingoldby, with the rest of the English and Dutch Generals, were on the left; and the Duke of Marlborough in the center commanded the whole. Major-General Wilks made the first onset with five English battalions of Howe, Ingoldby, Marlborough, Rowe, and North and Grey, and four battalions of Hessians, supported by the Lord Cutts, and Major-General St. Paul, with eleven other battalions, and fifteen squadrons of horse, under the command of Major-General Wood. The five English battalions, led on by Brigadier Rowe, who charged on foot at the head of his own regiment with unparalleled intrepidity, assaulted the village of Blenheim, advancing to the very muzzles of the enemies muskets, and some of the Officers exchanging thrusts of swords with the French through the palisadoes. But, being exposed to a fire much superior to their own, they were soon obliged to retire, leaving behind them one third part of their men either killed or mortally wounded, the Brigadier who commanded them, being among the last. In this retreat, they were pursued by thirteen squadrons of the French Gendarmes and Carabiniers who would have intirely cut them to pieces, had not the Hessian infantry stopped their career, by the great fire they made upon them. The French being repulled, and forced to fly in their turn, were chased by five squadrons of English horse, who, by this time, had passed the rivulet; but, whilst the enemy rallied themselves, some fresh Brigades, superior in number, came to their assistance, charged the assailants with great vigour, and obliged many of them to repass the rivulet with great precipitation. Here again the Hessian foot performed signal service, putting the French to the rout by their continual fire, and regaining the colours, which they had taken from Rowe's regiment.

While Rowe's brigade rallied themselves, that of Ferguson, commanded by himself, attacked the village of Blenheim on the left, but with no

1704. no better success; and, though both returned three or four times to the charge with equal vigour, yet they were both still repulsed with like disadvantage, so that it was found impossible to force the enemy in that post, without entirely sacrificing the Confederate infantry.

The English foot having thus begun the engagement on the left, the horse of the same wing passed the rivulet, with great bravery, over-against the center or main battalia of the enemy; as did likewise that of the right wing, having made several passages with divers pieces of wood. After which, they drew up in order of battle, the French and Bavarians giving them all the time, that could be desired for that purpose, keeping themselves very quiet on the hills, which they were possessed of, without descending into the meadows towards the rivulet, so that even the second line of the horse had time to form themselves: And to this capital fault of the French, the Confederates were thought to have owed principally their victory. This neglect is said to have proceeded from an ill-timed haughtiness and presumption of Marshall de Tallard, who being informed, that the Allies were laying bridges on the rivulet, used this expression, "If they have not bridges enough, I will lend them some;" and when they told him that our troops were actually coming over the rivulet, he is reported to have said, "Let them pass; the more comes over, the more we shall have to kill and make prisoners." But, on the other hand, it is alleged by some, that he had given positive orders not to let the enemy pass the rivulet, but to charge them as they passed, which orders were not executed (1).

At length the Duke's cavalry moving towards the hill, that of Marshall de Tallard came down, and charged them with a great deal of fury; the French infantry, which were posted at Blenheim, making at the same time a terrible fire from behind some hedges on their flank, which were advanced too near that village, so that the first line was put into such disorder, that part of them retired beyond the rivulet. Upon this, the Duke gave orders to Lieutenant General Bulow, Commander in chief of the troops of Lunenburg, to bring up his own regiment of dragoons and two of the troops of Zell, which charged the enemy's horse with so much vigour, that they broke them, and drove them beyond the second rivulet called Moul-Weyer, and from thence to the very hedges of the village of Blenheim. This gave time to those, who had given ground, to repass the rivulet, and to form a second line behind those regiment of dragoons, and some others, that had joined them, so that these dragoons remained in the first line during the rest of the action.

The cavalry of the Confederates left wing, having by this success gained the advantage of forming themselves entirely in order of battle, advanced leisurely to the top of the hill, and several times charged the enemy's horse, who were always routed, but who, nevertheless, rallied every time, though at a considerable distance, and thereby gave the Allies an opportunity of gaining ground. As the Duke of Malbrough, who was now in person among them,

(1) Monsieur de Fequieres in his Memoirs observes, that the loss of that battle was owing to the inattention of the French Generals to those maxims of War, which ought to guide men, when they consider, whether they have sufficient reasons either to give or receive battle, or whether they can derive, from the particular disposition of their troops, any reasonable hopes of defeating the enemy. In examining this subject, the Marquis points out first the errors, that were committed with reference to the general state of the war in Germany previous to the battle, and then those errors, which appeared in the particular disposition of the French army. With regard to the first point, he asserts, that it was absolutely improper at that time, to trust the decision of the war in Germany to the event of a single battle; and this truth was the less doubtful, because it appeared that the English and Dutch had almost abandoned the war in Flanders in that campaign, to make a decisive effort in Germany, without which the Emperor could no longer have supported himself, nor could they have drawn any supplies of men from Germany. The French ought therefore to have avoided this battle, since they could have maintained their situation, if they had only compelled the English and Dutch, either to withdraw from that Country, or entirely to discontinue the war in Flanders. The Elector of Bavaria was Master of the whole course of the Danube, almost from its source to the Frontiers of Austria, into which he could penetrate when he pleased; and therefore the Emperor, whose attention was then employed by the Malecontents in Hungary, was likewise obliged to have a watchful eye on Austria and Tirol, as well for the preservation of these Provinces, as the security of a free communication with his army in Italy.

The bridges, which the Elector of Bavaria had on the Danube, opened to him a free communication with the Upper-Palatinate. The Emperor consequently must be always apprehensive, that he would pour a body of troops into Bohemia, where the People were exceedingly averse to the severity of the Imperial Government, and where their fears were the only motives to their submission: which made it likewise necessary for the Emperor to maintain a body of troops to cover Bohemia and Moravia. Nuremberg, an Imperial City and almost in the heart of the Empire, being the most considerable City in all the Circle of Francia, it was incumbent on the Emperor to preserve it in the interest of the Confederates. If the Elector of Bavaria should make himself Master of it, as he had already seized Ulm and Augsburg, Nuremberg therefore could not be preserved by the protection of the Confederate army, which consequently could not withdraw to any great distance from that City, whose preservation was of the more importance to the Emperor, since the loss of it would deprive him of all communication with his Dominions on the Rhine, except through the Country on the other side of the Main: when the situation of Nuremberg would have rendered altogether impracticable. It was likewise evident that the Confederate army could not treat to any considerable distance from a City, where all their ammunition and provisions were deposited. The Allies forced by forcing the pass at Donauwörth, and taking Donauwörth, had obtained a bridge over the Danube and separated the fortified places of the French on the Upper-Danube, from those on the Lower. But, as their provisions were still lodged either in Nuremberg or Nollingen, they durst not venture to quit Irresheim and Stadla, to advance into Bavaria. This obvious reflection was alone sufficient to convince the French Generals, that their inducements to engage the enemy could not possibly have any weight, but that it was rather their interest to decline a general action, especially as this cautious

1704. was preparing a fresh attack, Marshal de Tallard caused ten of his battalions to advance, to fill up the intervals of his cavalry, in order to make a last effort; which, the Duke perceiving, caused three battalions of the troops of Zell to come up and sustain the horse. Then the Prince of Hesse-Cassel, General of the horse, and the Lieutenant-Generals Lumley, Bulow, Hompesch, and Ingoldby, returned with their troops to the charge; but the superior fire of the enemy's infantry put their first line into some disorder, so that it shrunk back, and remained, for some time, at about sixty paces distant from the enemy, neither party advancing against the other. At length, the Confederates pushed forwards with so much bravery and success, that, having broke and routed the enemy's horse, the ten battalions, who found themselves abandoned by them, were cut to pieces, none escaping but a very few soldiers, who threw themselves on the ground, as dead, to save their lives.

Marshal de Tallard rallied his broken cavalry behind some tents, which were still standing in his camp; and, seeing things in this desperate condition, resolved to draw off his dragoons and infantry out of the village of Blenheim. He thereupon sent one of his Aid-de-camps to Marshal de Marsin, who, with the Elector of Bavaria, commanded on the left, to desire him, "to face the enemy with some troops on the right of the village of Oberklaus, to keep them in play, and favour the retreat of the infantry, that was in Blenheim." But Marshal de Marsin represented to the Messenger,

"That he had too much business in the front of the village, where he was posted, and where he had to deal with the Duke of Marlborough, who was come to the assistance of Prince Eugene, as well as in the rest of the line, to spare any troops; since he was so far from being victorious, that all he could do was to maintain his ground."

In the mean time, Ingoldby made the other Generals of the same attack sensible, how easily they might intirely defeat the French cavalry, by charging them on the right flank. This advice being put into execution with a great deal of vigour, the enemy were soon thrown into disorder, and put to flight, part of them endeavouring to gain the bridge, which they had over the Danube between Blenheim and Hockstet; and the other part, among whom were the Gens d'Armes, were closely pursued by the Lunenburg dragoons, and those, who escaped the slaughter, threw themselves into the Danube, where most of them were drowned. Those, who fled towards Hockstet, rallied once more, making a shew to succour the rest; but the same regiment of Bothmar faced them, and kept them in awe for some time, till it was joined by some other regiments, when the enemy made the best of their way to save themselves by flight.

The Marshal de Tallard was surrounded by the fugitives, and taken near a mill, behind the village of Sonderen, not far from the Danub; by Monsieur de Boinenburg, a Lieutenant-Colonel of the troops of Hesse-Cassel, Aid-de-Camp to the Prince of Hesse-Cassel. The Marquis de Mont-

tious conduct would infallibly have obliged the Allies to abandon the parts adjacent to the Danube, when they had consumed all the forage near that river.

Marshal de Villeroy was posted with a considerable army before the lines of Biel, which Prince Eugene had quitted, with the greatest part of his regular troops, and unperceived by that General. The conjunction of this Prince with the Duke of Marlborough was generally known; and Marshal de Villeroy might have waked from his inactivity, and forced the lines, which were only guarded by an inconsiderable body of militia; and might afterward, have advanced with his army through the Duchy of Wirtemberg, to the Neckar, which would have rendered the Allies incapable of preserving their communication with the Lower-Neckar for the security of their provisions, which were conveyed to Norlingen from the Rhine and the Main. And thus would this single motion have limited the supply of the provisions of the Allies to Nuremberg, and consequently they could never think it safe to be remote from that City.

Marshal de Villeroy might even have compelled the Allies to retire, in part, to the Rhine, and leave the Elector of Bavaria to act with freedom in the heart of Germany, if that General had forced the lines of Biel, and then marched his army down the Rhine near Philipsburg. For this motion alone would have obliged the enemy to separate, in order to protect Philipsburg, and the Lower-Neckar. This march might likewise have been effected without the least danger, because, when the lines had once been forced, Marshal de Villeroy might have thrown a bridge over the Rhine, in case the Allies had approached him with all their forces; and, if they had attempted that motion, they would have abandoned Ausrin, and even the City of Vienna to the Elector of Bavaria.

These were the errors committed with respect to the general state of the war in Germany: the rest related to the particular disposition and order of battle, and were as follow:

1. The French and Bavarians incamped their two armies, as if they were to engage separately.

2. They disposed them on the day of battle, in the order of their incampment, and only in the front of the camp.

3. They did not chuse their field of battle so near the rivulet as would have prevented the Allies from passing it, and not have left them a sufficient extent of ground to form their troops between the rivulet and the front of the French line.

4. They neglected to advance their right and center upon the Allies, when they saw they had passed the rivulet, and formed themselves on the front of the French.

5. They had not the precaution to take a strict view of the rivulet, when they arrived at their camp; and were so inconsiderate, as not to post a body of infantry along the bank for the security of their camp, and to gain intelligence of the motions of the Allies.

6. They were so injudicious, as to form their center of battle out of the right and left wings of their two armies, instead of providing a formidable center of infantry.

7. They shut up the greatest and best part of Marshal de Tallard's infantry in the village of Blenheim, where they were posted without the least order, and rendered incapable of forming any motion; and they had not even the least precaution to secure a communication from one brigade or regiment to another.

8. They did not survey the ground, which extended from their right to the rivulet and the Danube, and they posted dragoons there instead of infantry.

9. When they arrived at their camp, they neglected to detach a body of cavalry, beyond the left of their armies, to observe the situation of the camp of the Allies, which they were unacquainted with to such a degree, as not to know that Prince Eugene had joined the Duke of Marlborough with his army; and they imagined, 1704. peroux, General of horse; de Sepperville, de Silly, and de la Paluere, Major-Generals; Monsieur de la Mesfriere, St. Poiange, de Legondais, and several other Officers of note, were likewise made prisoners in this defeat.

While these things passed at the village of Blenheim and in the center, the Duke of Marlborough caused the village of Oberklau, which was Marshal de Morsin's quarters, to be attacked by the brigade of Berensdorff, consisting of ten battalions. The Prince of Holstein-Beck, who commanded them as Major-General, passed the rivulet at the head of two battalions, with undaunted resolution. But as the Imperial cavalry, which was to have supported him, were wanting in their duty, and kept musket-shot from him, he was scarce got over, when seven or eight of the enemy's battalions fell upon him with great fury, before he could form his two battalions; so that one of them, that of Goor, was almost intirely cut to pieces, and the Prince himself desperately wounded and taken prisoner. But, notwithstanding this first shock, these battalions were no sooner supported by some Danish and Hanoverian cavalry, than they charged a second time, but with no better success; till, upon the third charge, the Duke of Marlborough having himself brought up some squadrons, which were supported by others of the body of reserve, made them advance with some battalions beyond the rivulet; upon which the enemy began to retire.

As soon as the Duke had performed this considerable service, he repaired to the center, where, finding the action decided in favour of the Confederates, he caused part of his victorious cavalry to halt, to observe the motions of that part of the enemy, which, by this time, was drawn up beyond the morafs of Hochstet. During this halt the Elector of Bavaria, whom Prince Eugene could make no impression upon for some time, but whose bravery at last put that Elector's troops to the rout, was perceived making his retreat from the village of Lutzingen. Upon which, orders were dispatched to the Baron de Hompesch (who with several squadrons was pursuing the fugitives towards Morslingen, 1704. and who had already overtaken and forced two of their battalions to lay down their arms) to face about, and march to join those, who halted, as well to prevent the Elector's falling upon Hompesch's rear, as to form a body, in order to charge that Prince, who marched in great haste, but in pretty good order, with his squadron on the left and his battalions on the right. But, before General Hompesch returned from his chase, the right wing of the Confederate army was perceived at some distance behind the Elector; and, appearing to be part of his army marching in such a manner, as might easily have flanked them, had the Duke immediately charged him, the Duke, with great prudence, sent out a party to view them. During this time, the Elector continued marching off with great precipitation, till he reached the morafs of Morslingen.

The French horse being intirely defeated, and the Confederates masters of all the ground, which was between the enemy's left and the village of Blenheim, the twenty-eight battalions and twelve squadrons of dragoons, which were in the village, found themselves cut off from the rest of their army, and, despairing of being able to make their escape, after a weak attempt to repulse the infantry, who surrounded them, capitulated about eight in the evening, laid down their arms, delivered their colours and standards, and surrendered themselves prisoners of war, on condition, that the Officers should not be searched.

This defeat cost the enemy, by their own accounts in several intercepted letters, forty thousand men, in which number they included four or five thousand lost in their precipitate retreat to the Black Forge, either by desertion, or the pursuit of the Hussars or Peasants, who made a great slaughter of the stragglers. This computation does not seem improbable, considering the number of prisoners taken, which exceeded thirteen thousand, of whom above one thousand two hundred were Officers; that ten French battalions on their right were cut in pieces, and above thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons forced imagined, that the Prince of Baden was engaged with a considerable body of troops at the siege of Ingoldstadt.

10. After the first disorder in their grand center of cavalry, and after they had shrunk from their ground, till they formed a confused line with the infantry, who were embarrassed in the village of Blenheim, the Elector of Bavaria's army did not close on their right, to form an attack in flank upon the enemy, who had advanced beyond the interval of ground, that extended between the two villages. Had they disposed themselves into this motion, they might either have sustained or drawn off the French infantry from Blenheim, and have given their cavalry, who had been disordered by the fire of the enemy's foot, an opportunity of rallying in order of battle. But, instead of this obvious motion, that whole army was only attentive on their retreat to Ulm; and they abandoned Marshal de Tallard's infantry, while the cavalry of that General's army never attempted to recover their proper order, or make any effort to disengage their infantry, when they saw the Elector's army retreat from the field of battle.

11. When Marshal de Tallard was taken prisoner, and the center of the French army intirely thrown into disorder, not one of the General Officers of the Marshal's army made the least endeavour to draw the infantry from Blenheim, while they had an opportunity of affording them that relief, by marching them along the Danube, till they had rejoined their cavalry; but, on the contrary, those who were charged, in particular, with the command of the body of infantry, either intirely abandoned them, even before they were attacked, when they saw the cavalry defeated, and plunging themselves into the Danube, in hopes of swimming to the other side; or else they continued in the village without daring to leave it, and were even so destitute of thought, as not to attempt any communication between the battalions. In short, they seemed to continue there with no other view than to charge themselves with the despicable province of making a brave set of battalions lay down their arms with reluctance, and of surrendering to the enemy twenty-seven battalions and twelve squadrons of the best troops of France; which was so infamous an action, that it would scarce be credited by Posterity, especially when it is informed, that, except one Brigadier of foot, who was broke, all the other Authors or Spectators of this contemptible timidity were rewarded and advanced to stations of dignity.

1704. forced into the Danube, most of whom were drowned: That their left wing suffered very much, especially the foot: That besides ninety-five Officers, who were found at Hochstet, Dillingen and Loevingen; and that the number of the wounded, whom they brought off from Ulm, were above seven thousand men: The Confederates gained above one hundred pieces of cannon, twenty-four mortars, one hundred and twenty-nine colours, one hundred and seventy-one standards, seventeen pair of kettle-drums, three thousand six hundred tents, thirty-four coaches, three hundred laden mules, two bridges of boats, fifteen pontons, twenty-four barrels, and eight casks of silver. But this success cost them four thousand four hundred and eighty-five men killed, seven thousand five hundred and twenty-five wounded, and two hundred and seventy-three left or made prisoners.

The Duke of Marlborough made great acknowledgments to the Duke of Marlborough for this signal service, and offered to make him a Prince of the Empire, which the Duke said he could not decently accept of, till he knew the Queen's pleasure; and, upon her consenting to it, he was created a Prince of the Empire, and about a year after Mindelheim was assigned him for his principality.

The success of the battle having entirely changed the face of affairs in the Empire, and saved the House of Austria from ruin, the Duke of Marlborough, being willing to lose no time, and judging it more advantageous for the common cause to join all the Confederate forces together, to strengthen the enemy as much as possible, and oblige them to abandon Germany, and repass the Rhine, sent an Express to Prince Lewis of Baden, to leave the siege of Ingoldstadt, and rejoin the army with the forces under his command; considering, that not only that City, but the whole Country of Bavaria must fall of course into the Emperor's hands. The Duke's and Prince Eugene's opinion was confirmed by the example of the city of Augsburg, which the French abandoned, carrying with them four hostages, as a security for two thousand sick and wounded men, whom they left in that place. The Magistrates being assembled immediately after, sent four Deputies to the Duke of Marlborough to desire his protection; who answered them, that they had nothing to fear from the troops of her Britannic Majesty and the States-General, which were only sent against the enemies of the Empire and their Allies. And thereupon he ordered a detachment to march, and take possession of that important place. Soon after Marshal de Tallard, with the prisoners of distinction, were sent towards Hanau and Frankfort under a guard of dragoons, and the other prisoners were sent into the adjacent places.

Aug. 15. On the 21st of August, the Duke encamped at Sesfelingen, within half a league of Ulm; and the next day the Governor of Ulm, who apprehended a siege, sent out of the town four hundred and thirty prisoners, which the enemy had taken at Hochstet, Dillingen, and other places, with a compliment to the Duke, that he would be pleased to take an opportunity to return an equal number; and, those persons being Germans, the Duke sent them to Prince Eugene.

On the 25th, the Duke, Prince Eugene, and Prince Lewis of Baden had a long conference, wherein they concerted the further operations of the campaign; and it was resolved, that, seeing the enemy were returning towards the Rhine, all the Confederate forces should likewise march that way, except twenty-three battalions and some squadrons, which should be left under the command of General Thungen to carry on the siege of Ulm. In pursuance whereof, the Confederate troops began their march from the neighbourhood of Ulm, on the 26th of August, by different roads, to the general rendezvous of the army which was appointed to be at Bruschal near Philipsburg. From that day the Confederate army was in motion till the 9th of September, when a party of Imperial horse, having met some squadrons of the enemy, commanded by the Duke de Monfort, a Major-General, who had been conducting four battalions and a sum of money into Landau, fell upon them with great vigour, and routed them, killing above one hundred upon the spot, taking several prisoners, and mortally wounding their Commander. On the 12th, Prince Lewis of Baden marched towards Landau with the troops appointed to besiege that place; and the Duke of Marlborough with Prince Eugene came to the camp of Croon Weissenburg, in order to cover the siege. The same night, the Duke received an Express from General Thungen, importing, that, having formed the siege of Ulm, and received his great artillery, the garrison beat a parley the 10th, and the next day surrendered that place upon honourable terms; which he was willing to grant, that no time might be lost for the further execution of the projects of this campaign. The Imperialists found in Ulm two hundred and twenty-two pieces of brass cannon, twenty-five brass mortars, one thousand two hundred barrels of powder, with a considerable quantity of provisions, which was seasonably applied to the carrying on the siege of Landau, which Prince Lewis of Baden insisted on, as necessary to secure the Circles, Suabia in particular, from the excursions of that garrison. This was popular in Germany, and, though the Duke did not approve it, he did not oppose it with all the authority, that his great success gave him. This was universally blamed, for, while France was in the consternation, which their late great loss brought them under, a more vigorous proceeding was like to have greater effects; and, besides that the Imperial army was ill-provided, the great charge of a siege was above their strength. Prince Lewis suffered much in his reputation for this undertaking: It was that which the French wished for, and therefore it was suspected, that some secret practice had prevailed on that Prince to propose it. It is certain, that he was jealous of the glory which the Duke of Marlborough had obtained, and in which himself had no share; and it was believed, that if he had not gone to besiege Ingoldstad, the battle of Hochstet had never been fought. He was indeed so fierce a bigot in his Religion, that he could not bear the successes of those, whom he called Heretics, and the exaltation, which he thought hereby might have upon it (1). While the Duke of Marlborough lay covering the siege, Marshal

1704. Marshal de Villeroi with his army came and looked on him; but, as the soldiers of the Confederates were exalted with their success, so the French were too much dispirited with their losses to make any attack, or to put any thing to hazard, in order to raise the siege. They retired back, and went into quarters, and trusted to the bad state of the Imperial army, who were ill-provided and ill-supplied. The garrison made as vigorous a defence, and drew out the siege to as great a length, as could be expected. Prince Lewis had neither engineers nor ammunition, and wanted money to provide them; so that, if the Duke had not supplied him, he must have been forced to give it over. The King of the Romans came again, to have the honour of taking the place: But his behaviour there did not serve to raise his character; for he was not often in the places of danger, and was content to look on at a great and safe distance. He was likewise constantly beset with priests, and such a face of superstition and bigotry appeared about him, that it very much damped the hopes, that were given of him. However, on the 23d of November, the besiegers having lodged themselves on the counterscarps both on the right and left, and sufficient breaches being opened, the next morning the necessary dispositions were made for a general assault, and five thousand men were commanded upon that service. The Besieged, being therefore reduced to this extremity, were obliged to beat a parley between ten and eleven o'clock, whereupon hostages were exchanged, and the capitulation signed the same day, consisting of twenty-eight articles, which were in effect much the same as those granted by the Imperialists to Monsieur de Melac two years before, and by the French to the Count de Frize the preceding campaign. On the 26th, the Besieged marched out of Landau to the number of three thousand four hundred, who survived out of seven thousand men, of whom the garrison consisted at the beginning of the siege. The King of the Romans, having entered the place, found it reduc'd to a heap of rubbish, and having given the command of it to the Count de Frize, who had before maintained that post with great courage and ability, his Majesty set out for Vienna, having ordered

The Confederates, omitting nothing that might advance the glory, which they had already acquired in Bavaria, resolved to prosecute the siege of Traerbach. To which end, the Duke of Marlborough marched towards the Moselle with a considerable army, which he left under the command of the Hereditary Prince of Hesse-Cassel, as also the direction of the attacks of that place. The castle was invested in the beginning of November, and the approaches were carried with such success, that, on the 21st, the Besiegers attempted to storm it. But as they were climbing up the eminences (the rock, on which that fortress is built, proving very steep, and the weather exceedingly stormy) the garrison made so vigorous a defence, that the assailants were obliged to retire with considerable loss. Notwithstanding these discouragements, the Prince of Hesse was resolved to carry on the siege with the utmost vigour; and, on the 20th of December obliged the garrison to surrender on honourable conditions. The Confederates met with a great deal of difficulty and opposition in all the attacks; and the Baron de Trogne, the States chief Engineer, was shot by the Prince of Hesse's side, as he was giving the necessary directions; and they had above a thousand men killed or wounded.

During the siege of Traerbach, the Duke of Marlborough went to the Court of Prussia, to negotiate, that eight thousand Prussians might be sent to Italy the next campaign, to serve there for the relief of the Duke of Savoy, under the command of Prince Eugene. He was received at Berlin, and all other places, through which he passed, with the highest respect; and thence he proceeded to the Court of Hanover, where he arrived on the 1st of December, and thence continued his journey to the Hague, where he was congratulated by the Deputies of the States-General, upon his victories at Schellenberg and Hochstet; and was as much considered and submitted to in Holland, as if he had been their Stadtholder. The credit, which he was in among them, was very happy for them, and was, indeed, necessary at that time, for keeping down their gives us this account of the Duke's own designs in this campaign: "Flanders, says he, was, at the beginning of the war, a very bad part to attack France in; it was covered with so strong a frontier. It was for this reason, the Duke of Marlborough looked out for another scene of action, and did all that could be done on his part towards it; and therefore when he had in the two first campaigns driven the French from Nimwegen to Namur, and had set the Dutch at ease by the reduction of Guelder and Limburg, and cleared the Rhine by taking Bonne, he did not the third year content himself with walking up and down in the neighbourhood of Holland, where there was no prospect of doing any thing to the purpose, but marched into the heart of Germany, forced the strong post of Schellenburg before the end of June, which is the key of Bavaria; and, had the ammunition and artillery been ready, as the Duke had been assured it was, he had marched directly to Munich, and, without the hazard of another battle, had in a fortnight's time not only extinguished that fatal war, that threatened nothing less than the ruin of the whole Empire, but had gained the Elector also over to the side of the Allies, who, could he have been persuaded to make their interest his own, might have done the greatest service to the common cause, both in Germany and Flanders. But when that point was lost, and the inability of the Germans to make a siege had encouraged the Elector to break off the treaty he had entered into, and the sword had decided the fate of his country, what part did the Duke of Marlborough take next? Not that of returning to Flanders: No, he improved the rest of that wonderful campaign to facilitate the operations of the next in a part, where France might be more easily attacked. He passed the Rhine before the end of August, and made, or rather submitted to the making the siege of Landau by Prince Lewis, while he covered it: And, that the unexpected length of the siege might not break his design, without waiting for the end of it, he advanced with a body of troops to the Saar, surprized Trever, and possessed himself of other proper posts for erecting magazines, and opening the next campaign with the siege of Saar-Lewis."

Only Amsterdam, as it was the most sensible of the common danger, so it was not only quiet within itself, but it contributed not a little to keep all the rest so, which was chiefly maintained by the Duke of Mariborough's prudent management; who, having settled all matters relating to the ensuing campaign, embarked for England, and arrived at London the 11th of December.

Proceedings in the Netherlands. Brodrick,

The occurrences in Brabant and Flanders this campaign were of no considerable importance. As the great bodies were in such violent motion in Bavaria, which was the theatre of the war, little, besides the protection of the Country on each side, was intended here. However, on the 1st of June, Monsieur Auverquerque decamped from the neighbourhood of Maebricht, and marched directly towards the enemy, who, being surprized at this motion, and unwilling to hazard a battle, after they were prevented in their design upon Tongeren, marched about, and got into their lines. General Dopff, perceiving them to be in some disorder, advanced with thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons, and forced the French lines with little opposition. But, a council of war being called, it was thought not advisable for him to continue in that post, lest the enemy should fall upon his detachment with a superior force, before the rest of the army could come up; so that he had not continued there above three hours, before he quitted the lines, and rejoined the army. On the 1st of July, the Baron de Trogne was detached with a considerable body of men, who marched towards Liege, and Monsieur Auverquerque followed him. On the 5th, the Baron being reinforced from Liege and Huy, he advanced to the enemies lines, which he entered at eight in the morning, and took post at Meerdorp. Monsieur Auverquerque endeavoured to sustain him; but this enterprize had no better success than the former; for, the rivers Herk and Demer overflowing, and retarding the march of the army, it was judged impossible to come up soon enough to support him; upon which, he retired out of the lines the same evening.

Bruges bombarded by Baron Spaar.

Upon the 2d of July, a body of nine thousand Dutch troops, commanded by General Spaar, appeared before Bruges, and were warmly received by the cannon of the town. In the evening they raised batteries, and the next morning began to throw bombs, carcasses, and red-hot bullets into the place, which did great execution, several houses being entirely demolished, and others very much shattered. Whereupon the inhabitants, to prevent farther mischief, offered to pay six hundred thousand guilders in six months time, which the Baron accepted, and so retired to Maldegem. On the 22d, the army, under Monsieur Auverquerque, passed the Maele, and advanced to Namar, which they bombarded from the 26th to the 29th, setting on fire their magazines, and doing very great damage to the inhabitants. The loss sustained by the Dutch was very inconsiderable, though the garrison fired furiously all the time from their cannon and mortars. During these hostilities, a detachment of horse and foot was sent up to Dinant, where they took post, and part of them passed over from thence into the country between the Sambre and Maele, which struck such a terror into the neighbouring country, that they exacted from thence great contributions. About the same time, the Dutch forces made themselves Masters of fort Isabella, and demolished it.

The Elector of Bavaria, who had retired to Brussels after his misfortunes, formed, at the end of the campaign, a project of surprizing General Auverquerque, hoping, by that means, in some measure, to repair the disadvantages, which he had sustained in Bavaria. For this purpose he ordered all his forces, with a great number of waggons, to join at Tirlemont. The French Court, being apprehensive of the Elector's designs, sent Marshal de Villeroy to watch his motions, and to prevent an engagement, unless he had a very fair prospect of a return of better fortune. At his arrival in the army, he was surprized to see Monsieur Auverquerque waiting in his camp at Borch-loen, ready to receive them. This obliged him to represent to the Elector the difficulties of attacking the Confederates; the advantage of their camp; the bravery of their troops, encouraged by the success of their affairs in Germany; and the ill consequences, which the loss of a battle would be attended with. The Elector, who was oppressed with disgraces, was determined on nothing but revenge, and insisted upon an engagement. The Marshal, after a very warm debate with him on that subject, told him, that he would not march; and, to put an end to the dispute, produced the King's order. The Elector, being thus frustrated in his designs, returned to Brussels, his former seat of pleasure and gallantry.

At sea, this summer, our affairs were carried on much more doubtfully than at land. Sir George Rooke sailed into the Streights, where he reckoned he was strong enough for the Toulon squadron, which was then abroad in the Mediterranean. Soon after that a strong squadron from Brest passed by Lisbon into the Streights. Mr. Meibuen, the English Ambassador in Portugal, apprehending, that, if these two squadrons should join to attack Sir George Rooke, it would not be possible for him to fight against so great a force, sent a man of war, which that Admiral had left at Lisbon, with some particular orders, which made the Captain very unwilling to carry the message; but the Ambassador promised to indemnify him. The Captain sailed through the French fleet, and brought this important advertisement to Sir George Rooke, who told him, that on this occasion he would pass by his not observing his orders, but that, for the future, he would find the safest course was to obey orders. Upon this, Sir George stood out of the way of the French towards the mouth of the Streights, and there met Sir Cloudesly Shovel with a squadron of our best ships, with which being reinforced, he sailed up the Streights again, being now in a condition to engage the French. He came before Barcelona, where the Prince of Hesse-Darmstadt assured him, there was a strong party ready to declare for King Charles, as it was certain, there was a disposition in many to do it. But Sir George would not stay above three days before that city; so that the motions within the town, and the discoveries which many made of their inclinations, had almost proved fatal to them. He answered, when pressed to stay a few days more, that his orders were positive; and that he must fail towards Nice, which it was believed the French intended to besiege. But, as he was sailing that way, he received advice, that the French had made no advances in that design; and therefore he turned his course westward, and came in sight of the French fleet, sailing from Brest to Toulon. The advantage, which he had, was so visible, that it was expected, he would have made towards the enemy, but he did not. What orders he had was not known, for the matter never came under examination. The French got to Toulon, and he steered another way. The whole French fleet was then together in that harbour, for tho' the Toulon Squadron had been out before, it was then in port. A very happy accident had preserved a rich fleet of Merchant-ships from Scanderoon, under the convoy of three or four frigates, from falling into their hands. The French fleet lay in their way in the bay of Tunis; and nothing could have saved them from being taken, but that, which happened in the critical minute, in which they needed it. A thick fog covered them all the while that they were sailing by that bay, so that they had no apprehension of the danger they were in, till they had passed it.

Gibraltar
taken.
Hist. of Europe.

Sir George Rooke, as he failed back, fell in upon Gibraltar, which, in a Council of war, held, July 17, about seven leagues to the eastward of Tetuan, it was resolved to attack. Four days after, the fleet got into the bay, and one thousand eight hundred marines, English and Dutch, with the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt at their head, were put on shore on the neck of land to the northward of the town, to cut off any communication with the Country. The Prince, having thus posted his men, sent a summons to the Governor to surrender the place for the service of his Catholic Majesty; which he refusing, the Admiral, the next day, gave orders, that the ships, which had been appointed to cannonade the town, under the command of Rear-Admiral Byng and Rear-Admiral Vanderduffon, as also those, which were to batter the South mole-head, commanded by Captain Hicks in the Yarmouth, should range themselves accordingly. But, the wind blowing contrary, they could not possibly get into their places till the day was spent. In the mean time, to amuse the enemy, Captain Whitaker was sent in with some boats, who burnt a French Privateer of twelve guns at the Old Mole. On the 23d, soon after break of day, the ships being all placed, the Admiral gave the signal for beginning the cannonade, which was performed with very great fury, above fifteen thousand shot being made in five or six hours time against the town, so that the enemy were soon driven from their guns, especially at the South-Mole-Head. Whereupon, the Admiral considering, that by gaining that fortification they should of consequence reduce the town, ordered Captain Whitaker, with all the boats armed, to endeavour to possess himself of it; which was performed with great expedition. But Captain Hickes and Captain Jumper, who lay next the Mole, had pushed on shore with their pinnaces and some other boats, before the rest could come up. Whereupon the enemy sprung a mine, which blew up the fortification about the Mole, killed two Lieutenants, and about forty men, and wounded about sixty. However, our men kept possession of the great platform, of which they had made themselves masters; and, Captain Whitaker landing with the rest of the seamen, who had been ordered upon this service, they advanced, and took a redoubt or small bastion, half way between the Mole and the town, and possessed themselves of many of the enemy's cannon; upon which the Governor desired to capitulate, and surrendered upon honourable terms. This fact is related by an eminent Historian, Burnet. with these circumstances, that, after the Admiral had bombarded the town to very little purpose, and with little hopes of success, some bold men ventured to go ashore in a place, where it was not thought possible to climb up the rocks; and yet they succeeded in it; and, when they had got up, they saw that all the women of the town were come out, according to their superstition, to a Chapel there, to implore the Virgin's protection. They seized on them, and that contributed not a little to dispose those in the town to surrender, which they did on the 24th, and they had leave to stay or go as they pleased; and, in case they staid, they were assured of protection in their Religion and every thing else, for the Prince of Hesse, who was to be their Governor, was a Papist. But they all went away with the small garrison, that had defended the Place. The Prince of Hesse, with the Marines, who were on board the fleet, possessed himself of the place; and they were furnished out of the stores, that went with the fleet, with every thing, that was necessary for their subsistence or defence; and a regular method was laid down of supplying them constantly from Lisbon.

Sir George Rooke, after he had supplied Gibraltar, failed again into the Mediterranean, and, in conjunction with the Dutch fleet under Vice-Admiral Callemburg, met off Malaga the Count Burnet, de Thoulouse with the whole French fleet, which was much superior to the English in number, and had many galleys with them, that were of great use. Sir George Rooke called a Council of war, in which it was resolved to engage the enemy; but there was not due care taken to furnish all the ships with a sufficient quantity of powder, for some had wasted a great part of their stock of ammunition before Gibraltar; however they had generally twenty-five rounds, and it had seldom happened, that so much powder was spent in an action at sea. On the 13th of August, as the two fleets engaged, Sir Cloudesly Shovel advanced with his Squadron to a close fight, for it was the maxim of our seamen to fight as near as they could; and he had the advantage, and the enemy's van gave way in no little confusion, as did their rear soon after, being no less vigorously attacked by the Dutch. But the enemies being very strong in the center, and some of the English ships being obliged to go out of the line for want of shot (occasioned by the great expence of it at Gibraltar) several of Sir George Rooke's own Squadron suffered very much. About seven in the evening, one of the French Admiral's seconds advanced out of the line, and began a close fight with the St. George, commanded by Sir John Jennings, but, notwithstanding the St. George had already suffer'd much, she met with such rough treatment, that she had difficulty enough to rejoin the line, after the loss of both her Captains and many of her men. The engagement continued till night parted them, and, if the French had come to a new engagement

1704. engagement next day, it might have been fatal, since many of our ships were without shot, whilst others had enough and to spare. In this long and hot action there was no ship on either side, that was taken, sunk, or burnt. The English made a flew the next day of preparing for a second engagement, but the enemy bore off, to the great joy of our fleet. The French suffered much in the action, and went into Toulon so disabled, that they could not be put in a condition to go to sea again in many months. They left the sea, as the field of battle, to the English; so that the honour of the action remained with us, though the Nation was not greatly elated with the news of a drawn battle at sea with the French: It was long before a certain account of the action was brought to England; but the modesty, with which the French King wrote of it to the Archbishop of Paris, put us out of all fears; for, whereas the French stile was very boasting of their successes, in this case it was only said, that the action was to his advantage. From that cold expression the English concluded, that the victory was on their side. When the full account was sent home from our fleet, the partialities on both sides appeared very signally. The Tories magnified this as a great victory; but persons skilled in naval affairs, differed much in their sentiments, about Sir George Rooke's conduct in that action, some not only justifying, but extolling it as much as others condemned it (1).

Sir George Rooke, after the engagement, failed to Gibraltar, where he stayed eight days to refit; and, having supplied that place with men and provisions, failed from thence, and returned home with the great Ships, leaving behind him eighteen men of war, under the command of Sir John Leake, both for the defence of the coast of Portugal, and to be in readiness to succour Gibraltar, if there should be occasion.

The success of affairs in Portugal this year 1704. was by no means answerable to the expectation of the Allies.

After several Councils of war held in the presence of their Catholic and Portuguese Majesties, which passed not without some disputes between Duke Schomberg and the Portuguese Generals and Ministers; the auxiliary Forces of England and Holland began to land, the 16th of March, N. S. Duke Schomberg had warmly insisted, that these auxiliaries might keep in a Body; urging the inconveniences, that might attend their separation. But the King of Portugal, being unwilling to trust the defence of the frontier towns to his raw and undisciplined troops, and there happening some coldness between the English General and Monsieur Fagel, who commanded the Dutch forces, at their very first interview, the English infantry had their quarters assigned in Oliveira, Elvas, Portalegre, and other places in the province of Alentejo; and the Dutch were sent up the Tagus towards Abrantes. The King of Portugal, by his treaties with England and Holland, had engaged to furnish horses to mount the cavalry and dragoons of these two Nations; but, whilst the King of Spain, Charles, was detained in Holland and England by contrary winds, the French Ambassador in Portugal, with great industry, had bought up the best horses of that Kingdom; so that, most of the horses, which his Portuguese Majesty's Officers afterwards provided for the English and Dutch auxiliaries, being neither of a size nor strength fit for service, scarce one third part of the troopers and dragoons were mounted this campaign. Neither was there better provision made for sick soldiers, who, after so tedious a passage, could not but be very numerous, and of whom many died for want of attendance and necessities. Another cause of the ill success of the campaign was, that, though the King of Portugal

(1) Sir Claude-Joseph Shovel's Letter on this occasion was as follows:

"This brings news of my health, and that we are on our way homeward: That which sends us home so soon, is a very sharp engagement we have had with the French: Our number of ships that fought in the line of battle were pretty equal: I think they were forty-nine, and we fifty-three; but Sir George Rooke reserved some of the fifty-gun ships, to observe if they attempted any thing with their galleys, of which they had twenty-four. Their ships did exceed in bigness. I judge they had seventeen three-deck ships, and we had but eleven. The battle began on Sunday the 13th instant, soon after ten in the morning, and in the center and rear of the fleet it continued till night parted: but in the van of the fleet, where I commanded, and led by Sir John Leake, we having the weather-gage, gave me an opportunity of coming as near as I pleased, which was within pistol shot, before I fired a gun, through which means, and God's assistance, the enemy declined us, and were upon the run in less than four hours, by which time we had little wind, and their galleys towed off their lame ships and others as they pleased; for the Admiral of the White and Blue, with whom we fought, had seven galleys tending upon him. As soon as the enemy got out of the reach of our guns, and the battle continuing pretty hot a-stern, and some of our ships in the Admiral's squadron towing out of the line, which I understood afterwards, was for want of shot, I

No. 43. VOL. III.

"ordered all the ships of my division to slack all their sails, to close the line in the center; this working had that good effect, that several of the enemies ships a-stern, which had kept their line, having their top-sails and fore-sails set, shot up a-breast of us, as the Rear-Admiral of the White and Blue, and some of his division; and the Vice-Admiral of the White, and some of his division; but they were so warmly received, before they got a broad-side, that with their boats a-head, and their sprit-sails set, they towed from us without giving us the opportunity of firing at them.

"The ships, that suffered most in my division, were the Lenox, Warpsight, Tilbury, and Swiftsure; the rest escaped pretty well, and I the best of all; though I never took greater pains in all my life to be soundly beaten; for I set all my sails, and rowed with three boats a-head, to get along-side with the Admiral of the White and Blue; but he out-failing me, shunned fighting, and lay along-side of the little ships: notwithstanding, the engagement was very sharp, and, I think, the like between two fleets never has been in any time. There is hardly a ship, that must not shift one mast, and some must shift all; a great many have suffered much, but none more than Sir George Rooke and Captain Jennings in the St. George. God send us well home: I believe we have not three spare top-masts, nor three fives in the fleet, and I judge there are ten jury-masts now up. After the fight, we lay two days in sight of the ene-

They had an army, but they had made no preparations for taking the field; nor could they bring their troops together, for want of provisions and carriages. The forms of their Government made them very slow, and not easily accessible. They were too proud to confess, that they wanted any thing, when they had nothing; and too indolent to exert themselves, in order to execute what was in their power to do; and the King's ill health furnished them with an excuse for every thing, that was defective and out of order. The Priests, both in Spain and Portugal, were so universally in the French interest, that even the House of Austria, which had been formerly so much in their favour, was now in disgrace with them. Their Alliance with Heretics, and their bringing over an Army of them to maintain their pretensions, had made all their former services be forgotten. The governing body at Rome did certainly engage all their zealots every where to support that interest, which was so determined on the destruction of Heresy. The English and Dutch Generals were likewise upon ill terms with the Portuguese. Duke Schomberg, by his title of Captain-General of the Queen of Great-Britain's forces in Portugal, ought certainly to have commanded, at least, all the English and Dutch auxiliaries: And it had been no bad policy in the King of Portugal to have made him likewise Commander in chief of all his forces; a post, which the Duke's father had formerly executed in that Kingdom with such success, that he refused the Crown of Portugal from the Spaniards, and fixed it in the family, that wear it at present. But though few, if any, of the Portuguese Officers had the necessary qualifications to be made Generals; yet the King of Portugal would not break the established rule of that Kingdom, whereby the Governors of provinces command in chief all the troops within their districts. He had, indeed, made Duke Schomberg Velt-Marshal-General of the Portuguese forces; but then his conferring the same dignity upon Monsieur Fagel, General of the Dutch forces rather lessened than honoured the Duke, and made Fagel unwilling to obey one, to whose level the King of Portugal had raised him; so that there was little concurrence of councils and designs between these two Generals. To all this may be added, that a French Lady, married to the Duke of Cadaval, the principal person in the Court of Portugal, was not a little instrumental in retarding the preparations for the campaign.

Upon information, that the auxiliaries, which the King of France had sent to his grandson Philip V., consisted, for the most part, of Irish soldiers; Duke Schomberg, pursuant to the Queen's warrant, published a proclamation, Apr. 25. promising "her gracious pardon to all such of her subjects, who, being now in the service of her enemies, would quit the same, to come over to Charles III. King of Spain, or any other of her Majesty's Allies; and that such of them, as were qualified to serve in her Majesty's forces, should be received and entertained in the same quality, as they enjoyed in the service they left: And that such as, by reason of their Religion, could not serve in her Majesty's forces, should be employed in the service of the King of Spain, or of such other of her Majesty's Allies, where they should best like." Charles III. and the King of Portugal published likewise their respective manifestoes; the first setting forth his title to the Crown of Spain, and promising "his pardon to all such of his subjects, as should declare for him within three months time." The other "justifying his Portuguese Majesty's taking up arms, to restore the liberty of the Spanish Nation oppressed by the power of France, and to assert the right of his Catholic Majesty, Charles III. to that monarchy." Their Majesties had intended to be in a readiness to enter Spain by the middle of May, but it was the beginning of June before they reached Santarem, where they continued the rest of the spring-campaign.

The

"my, preparing for a second engagement, but the enemy declined and stood from us in the night."

Another Writer expresses himself thus: "The sea-fight, though very bloody, was far from being decisive, not a ship being lost on either side. 'Tis certain the enemy were superior to us both in weight and number; and, however many among us blamed the conduct of the Admiral, he came off, when all things are impartially considered, much better than could have been expected. Both sides claimed a victory, which in truth neither of them had; both pretending to seek out the other, and to come to a second engagement, for which neither of them cared; and the want of sufficient ammunition, on our side, argued a weakness, to say no worse, and ought not easily to be pardoned." In a letter from an Officer on board the fleet in this engagement, are these words: All the while we were daring the enemy, we went on the caren, by turns, to stop our shot-holes; so that had they engaged a second time, we must have engaged them board and board, and either have carried them, or sunk by their sides. In a word, we were obliged to leave them, lest they should suspect our weakness, and force us to be desperate.

During the action, were killed and wounded of the English two thousand three hundred and fifty-eight; of the Dutch four hundred; Sir Andrew Leake,

Captain of the Grafton, Captain Cow of the Ranelagh, Lieutenant Jennings of the St. George, the third Lieutenant of the Shrewsbury, and the first Lieutenant of the Lenox, were all the Officers of their rank that were killed; Captain Mynga, Captain Baker, Captain Kirkton, Captain Junper, Captain Myghels, Lieutenant Edisbury, and Lieutenant Leflock, were wounded, as were two Lieutenants of the Barfleur, and the Chaplain, seven or eight Lieutenants more, three Masters, and about as many boatswains and carpenters.

On the French side were killed the Bailly of Lorraine, Commodore of a squadron, and the Count de Thoulouze's Second; five Captains, of which three were Knights, a Commissary of Marines, six Lieutenants, and five sea Ensigns. Among the latter, the Marshal de Chateaufort's son, and the Sieur de Balem Villers, the Count de Thoulouze's Gentleman; the Count himself was wounded in the forehead, shoulder, and thigh; the Count de Relingues had his leg shot off; the Marquis de Herbault, Intendant of the fleet; Monsieur du Casse, Commodore of a squadron; Monsieur de Chateaufort; the Count de Philepoux, the Count de Comminges, Monsieur de Valincourt, the Count de Thoulouze's Secretary, seven Captains, eight Lieutenants, and about one hundred and fifty other Officers were wounded.

1704. The possessor of the Crown of Spain, stiled by the Allies Duke of Anjou, though the last in proclaiming war, was yet the first in maintaining his title by the sword; and, having invaded Portugal before his enemies were in a condition to oppose him, the Duke of Berwick, his General, (who began to shine there, tho' he had passed elsewhere for a man of no very great character) took the town of Sagura by a stratagem, and so intimidated the Governor of Salva-terra, that he delivered up the place without making any defence, and consented, that himself and his garrison should remain prisoners of war. From Salva-terra the Spaniards advanced farther into the country, and without any resistance made themselves masters of Cebrosos. Pera Garcia stood some discharges of cannon, and then surrendered to Count d' Aguilar. The inhabitants of Zebredo abandoned the place at the approach of the Spanish troops; and the town of Ibaña la Viella, rejecting, the summons of Don Joseph Salazar and the Marquis de Puysegur, was stormed and carried sword in hand. About the same time, the Marquis de Jeoffreville, having entered Portugal on the side of Almeida, put several villages under military execution; and Prince Tsercloes de Tilly, having advanced to Anches, raised great contributions round about, whilst the Marquis de Villadarias penetrated into Portugal another way. These uninterrupted successes of the Spaniards cast the Portuguese into great consternation; and General Pagel, who was posted at Castil-branco with four Dutch battalions, not thinking himself safe in that place, retired towards Abrantes with two battalions. The other two he posted at Sovereira Formosa, where they were soon after attacked by the Duke of Berwick, and, after a brave defence, most of them taken prisoners, with Major-General Weldeven. After this success, the Duke of Berwick passed the Tagus, joined another body of Spaniards, commanded by Prince Tsercloes de Tilly, and King Philip, being arrived in the army, invested Portalegre, the inhabitants of which forced the garrison to surrender at discretion; and amongst them an English regiment of foot commanded by Colonel Stanhope. From thence King Philip brought his victorious army before Castil-davide, which, though almost an open town, yet refused to open her gates, the garrison being encouraged to defend themselves by the resolution of the English regiment of Lieutenant-General Stuart, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Hussey. By this time King Charles and the King of Portugal being come to Santerem, it was resolved, that the Marquis das Minas, Governor and General of the arms of the Province of Beira, should make an irruption into Spain, and by that diversion endeavour to draw King Philip's forces from before Castil-davide. The Marquis having gathered a body of about fifteen thousand men, marched accordingly towards the Tagus; took by storm a Spanish place in Castile, called Fuente Grimaldo; defeated a body of French and Spaniards, commanded by Don Ronquillo; and made himself master of Mansinho. But though King Philip sent the Duke of Berwick with a strong detachment to observe the Portuguese, and it was from thence conjectured, that he would give over the attack of Castil-davide; yet the Duke of Berwick, finding, that the Marquis das Minas did not move forwards, returned soon after before Castil-davide. Hereupon Colonel Hussey proposed to the Portuguese to retire into the castle, and defend it to the last extremity; but the militia opened the gates to the Spaniards, and so the whole garrison were made prisoners of war. The weather being, by this time, exceedingly hot, King Philip sent his wearied troops into quarters of refreshment; and, not thinking it possible to preserve all his conquests, ordered his men to abandon them, except Maroan and Salva-terra, and to raze the walls of Portalegre, Castil-davide, and some other towns. About the same time the remainder of the English forces marched from Alentejo into the Province of Beira, and the Portuguese and Dutch into quarters of refreshment about Pena Major.

Thus affairs went on very unsuccessfully in Portugal, so that it was thought, if the Duke of Berwick had followed his advantages, nothing could have hindered his marching to Lisbon. The enemies success gave no small uneasiness in England, and Duke Schomberg, finding his advice had not that weight it deserved with the Portuguese, was desirous to quit a losing game. Upon which, the Queen resolved to bestow the command of her forces in Portugal on the Earl of Galway; who having accepted of it, more in submission to the Queen's command, than out of any great prospect or hope of success, represented the necessity of augmenting the forces and the train of artillery. All his demands were readily complied with, and four thousand men ordered to be sent to Portugal from England and Ireland, the States-General having agreed to send thither a proportionable number of their forces. The Earl having embarked at Portsmouth on board the Tartar man of war, with several French engineers and volunteers, in eight days sailing, safely arrived at Lisbon, where Duke Schomberg resigned to him the command of the English forces. About a month after, the Earl, have reviewed the Portuguese and Auxiliary forces, marched them over the little river Coa, and incamped near Almeida. On the 20th of September, the two Kings of Spain and Portugal came to the army with design to invade Castile; but, when they reached the river Agueda, which they intended to pass near Castil Rodrigo, they found the opposite banks so well guarded by the Spaniards, commanded by the Duke of Berwick, that they did not think it advisable to hazard the Loss of their whole army; and so, retiring farther into the territories of Portugal, they sent their troops into winter-quarters. On the other hand, the Spaniards were so weakened by the detachments sent under the command of the Marquis de Villadarias, to attempt the retaking of Gibraltar, that they were contented to defend their own Country, and had no thoughts of invading Portugal; so that things were quiet on those frontiers all the remaining part of the year.

The Spaniards had drawn all the forces they had in Andalusia and Estremadura together, to retake Gibraltar; and the Marquis de Villadarias had with him some French troops, with some Engineers of that Nation, who were chiefly relied on, and were sent from France to carry on the siege. This gave some disgust to the Spaniards, who were so absurd in their pride, that, though though they could do nothing for themselves, and indeed knew not how to let about it, yet could not bear to be taught by others, or to see themselves outdone by them. The siege was continued for four months, during which time, the Prince of Hesse had many occasions given him to distinguish himself very eminently, both as to his courage, conduct, and indefatigable application. Convoys came frequently from Lisbon with supplies of men and provisions, which the French were not able to hinder or intercept. Monsieur de Pointis at last came with a squadron of twenty French ships, and laying long in the bay, trying what could be done by sea, while the place was pressed by land. Upon that, a much stronger squadron was sent from Lisbon, under the command of Sir John Leake and Rear-Admiral Vander-Dasson, to relieve the place, and raise the siege, who arrived in the bay of Gibraltar on the 9th of October. In the mean while, Marshal de Telfe, who was sent by the Court of France, which was dissatisfied with the conduct of the Marquis de Villadarias, had no better success at land than that General; so that the enemy was at last obliged to raise the siege.

The siege is raised.
March 20.

Affairs in Italy,

In Italy the Duke of Savoy had a melancholy campaign, losing place after place; but he supported his affairs with great conduct, and shewed a firmness in his misfortunes, beyond what could have been imagined. Vercelli and Ivrea gave the Duke of Vendosme the trouble of a tedious siege: They defended themselves against him as long as possible. The Duke of Savoy's army was not strong enough to raise these sieges; so that both places fell at last into the enemy's hands. The French had not troops both to carry on the war, and to leave garrisons in those places; for which reason they demolished the fortifications. After they had succeeded so far, they sat down before Venue in the end of October. The Duke of Savoy posted his army at Crescentino, over-against it, on the other side of the Po: He had a bridge of communication; he went often into the place during the siege, to see and animate his men, and to give the necessary orders. The sick and wounded were carried away, and fresh men put in their stead. This siege proved the most famous of all that had been during the late war: It lasted above five months, the garrison being often changed, and always well supplied. The French army suffered much, by continuing the siege all the winter; and they were at a vast charge in carrying it on. The bridge of communication was, after many unsuccessful attempts, at last cut off; and the Duke of Savoy being, thus separated from the place, retired to Chivaz, and left them to defend themselves as long as they could, which they did beyond what could in reason have been expected. He complained much of the Emperor's failing to make good his promises; but, in a discourse upon that subject with her Majesty's Envoy, he said, though he was abandoned by his Allies, he would not abandon them himself.

The people of the Cevennes suffered much this summer. It was not possible to come to them with supplies, till matters should grow better in Piedmont, of which there was no prospect. They were advised to preserve themselves the best they could. Marshal Villars was sent into the country to manage them with a gentler hand; and the severe methods, taken by those formerly employed, being now disowned, he was ordered to treat with their Leaders, and to offer them full liberty to serve God in their own way without disturbance. They generally inclined to hearken to this, for they had now kept themselves in a body much longer than was thought possible in their low and helpless state. Some of them capitulated, and took service in the French army; but, as soon as they came near the armies of the Allies, they deserted, and went over to them; so that, by all this practice, the fire was rather covered at present than extinguished (1).

The disorders in Hungary had a deeper root and a greater strength. It was hoped, that the ruin of the Elector of Bavaria would have quite Affairs of Hungary.

(1) Colonel Cavallier, their principal Leader, in his Memoirs of the Wars of the Cevennes, B. IV. tells us, that the whole Country was now reduced to a Desert, an hundred Boroughs and Villages plundered and burnt, the prisons full of Protestants, and the succours, which had been promised two years before from England, not come, when Marshal de Villars arrived in the Province with fresh troops. The first thing he did after his arrival was to give notice to Cavallier, that, if he would come to any agreement, and lay down his arms, the Marshal had orders from the King to grant all his just demands; but, if Cavallier should refuse, the Protestants should expect no favour. At last, after a Conference between the Marshal and Cavallier, the latter in conjunction with his friends drew up Articles in behalf of the Protestants of the Cevennes, which were signed by the Marshal and Monsieur de Bosville, Intendant of Languedoc, in the King's name, on the one part, and by Cavallier and his Lieutenant Bilhard, on the other; and were as follow:

The humble request of the Protestants, in the Province of Languedoc to his Majesty.

I. That his Majesty be pleased to grant us Liberty of Conscience in all the Province, and to hold religious Assemblies in such Country-places, as they shall think convenient, and not in Cities or walled Towns.

Granted, provided they do not build Churches.

II. That all such, as are detained in the Gallies, only on account of Religion, since the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, be set at liberty in six weeks after the Date hereof.

Granted.

III. That all, who have left the Kingdom on account of Religion, shall have free liberty to return, and be restored to their estates and privileges.

Granted, on condition they take the Oath of Allegiance to the King.

IV. That the Parliament of Languedoc shall be established on its ancient foot, and restored to its privileges.

The King will advise.

V. That no Capitation-Tax shall be paid by the Province, during the space of ten years.

Refused.

VI. That we shall have the Cities of Montpellier, Cette, Perpignan, and Aiguemortes, as cautionary towns.

Refused.

VII. That the inhabitants of the Cevennes, whose houses have been burnt in the wars, shall pay no imposts for the term of seven years.

Granted.

1704. quite disheartened the malecontents, and have disposed them to accept of reasonable terms, if the Emperor could have been prevailed upon to offer them frankly, and immediately upon their first consternation, after the conquest of Bavaria. There were great errors in the Government of that Kingdom. By a long course of oppression and injustice, the Hungarians were grown savage and intractable; they saw they were both hated and despised by the Germans. The Court of Vienna seemed to consider them as so many enemies, who were to be depressed in order to their being extirpated; upon any pretence of plots, their persons were seized on, and their estates confiscated. The Jesuits were believed to have a great share in all these contrivances and prosecutions; and it was said, that they purchased the confiscated estates upon very easy terms. The Nobility of Hungary seemed irreconcilable to the Court of Vienna. On the other hand, those of that Court, who had those confiscations assigned them, and knew, that the restoring these would certainly be insisted on as a necessary article in any treaty that might follow, did all they could to obstruct such a treaty. It was visible, that Ragotzki, who was at their head, aimed at the principality of Transylvania; and it was natural for the Hungarians to look on his arriving at that dignity, by which he could assist and protect them, as the best security they could have. On the other hand, the Court of Vienna, being possessed of that principality, would not easily part with it. In the midst of all this ferment, a revolution happened in the Turkish Empire. A new Sultan was set up, so that all things were now at a stand, till it might be known what was to be expected from him. They were soon delivered from this anxiety, for he sent a Chin to the Court of Vienna, to assure them, that he would give no assistance to the malecontents. That Court, being freed from those apprehensions, resolved to carry on the war in Hungary as vigorously as they could. This was imputed to a secret practice from France on some of that Court; and there were so many concerned in the confiscations, that every proposition that way was powerfully supported. Thus Italy was neglected, and the siege of Laudau was ill-supported, their chief strength being employed in Hungary. Yet, when the Ministers of the Allies pressed the opening a treaty with the malecontents, the Emperor seemed willing to refer the arbitration of that matter to his Allies. But, though it was fit to speak in that style, yet no such thing was designed. A treaty was opened, but when it was known, that Zeiber had the chief management of it, there was no reason to expect any good effect of it. He was born a Protestant, a subject of the Palatinate, and was often employed by the Elector Charles Lewis to negotiate affairs at the Court of Vienna. He, seeing a prospect of rising in that Court, changed his Religion, and became a creature of the Jesuits, and adhered steadily to all their interests. He managed that secret practice with the French in the treaty of Ryswick, by which the Protestants of the Palatinate suffered so considerable a prejudice. The treaty in Hungary stuck at the preliminaries, for indeed neither side was then inclined to treat. The malecontents were supported by France: They were routed in several engagements, but these were not so considerable as the Court of Vienna gave out in their public news. The malecontents suffered much in them, but came soon together again, and they subsisted so well by the mines, of which they had possessed themselves, and the incursions they made, and the contributions they raised from the Emperor's subjects, that, unless the war was carried on more vigorously, or a peace offered more sincerely, that Kingdom was long like to be a scene of blood and rapine.

So likewise was its neighbouring Kingdom of Poland. It was hoped, that the talk of a new election was only a loud threatening, to force a peace sooner; but it proved otherwise. A dyet was brought together of those, who were irreconcilable to King Augustus; and, after many delays, Stanislaus Leszczynski, Palatine of Polsania, was chosen and proclaimed their King, and he was immediately owned by the King of Sweden. The Cardinal Primate seemed at first unwilling to agree to this; but he suffered himself to be forced into it; and this was believed to be an artifice of his to excuse himself to the Court of France, whose Pensioner he was, and to whom he had engaged to carry the election for the Prince of Conti. The war was carried on this year with various success on both sides. King Augustus made a quick march to Warsaw, where he surprized some of Stanislaus's party, the latter escaping narrowly himself. But the King of Sweden followed so closely, that, not being able to fight him, King Augustus was obliged to retreat into Saxony, where he continued for some months. There he ruined his own Dominions, by the great preparations he made to return with a mighty force; but his delays induced many to forsake his party; for it was given out, that he would return no more, and that he was weary of the war, which he had good reason to be. Poland, in the mean while, was in a most miserable condition. The King of Sweden subsisted his army in it, and his temper grew daily more fierce and Gothic. He was resolved to make no 1704 peace, till Augustus was driven out; but, in the mean time, his own Country suffered greatly. Livonia was destroyed by the Muscovites, who had taken Narva, and made some progress in Sweden. The Pope espoused the interests of King Augustus; for to support a new Convert of such importance was thought a point worthy the zeal of that See. He therefore cited the Cardinal Primate to appear at Rome, and to give an account of the share he had in all that war. The Pope was now wholly in the French interest, and maintained the character, which they pretend to, of a common Father, with so much partiality, that the Emperor himself, how tame and submissive soever to all the impositions of that See, yet could not but make loud complaints of it. The Pope had threatened, that he would thunder out excommunications against all those troops, which should continue in his Dominions. The Emperor was so implicit in his faith, and so ready in his obedience, that he ordered his troops to retire out of the Ecclesiastical State; but all the effect this had, was to leave that State entirely in the hands of the French, against whom the Pope did not think fit to fulminate, though he pretended still, that he would maintain a neutrality; and both the Venetians and the Great Duke adhered to him in that resolution, and continued neutral during the war.

Third Sess.
of the Parliament meets,
Oct. 29.
P. H. C.
III. 392.

After this view of the state of affairs abroad, it is time to return to England, where, on the 29th of October, the Parliament met at Westminster, according to the last prorogation; and the Queen, being come to the House of Peers, made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THE great and remarkable success, with which God has blessed our arms in this summer, has stirred up our good subjects in all parts of the Kingdom, to express their unanimous joy and satisfaction; and I assure myself, you are all come disposed to do every thing, that is necessary for the effectual prosecution of the war, nothing being more obvious, than that a timely improvement of our present advantages will enable us to procure a lasting foundation of security for England, and a firm support for the liberty of Europe. This is my aim. I have no interest, nor ever will have, but to promote the good and happiness of all my subjects.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I must desire such Supplies of you, as may be requisite for carrying on the next year's service both by sea and land, and for punctually performing our treaties with all our Allies, the rather, for that some of them have just pretensions depending ever since the last war; and I need not put you in mind, of what importance it is to preserve the public credit, both abroad and at home.

I believe you will find some charges necessary next year, which were not mentioned in the last Session, and some extraordinary expences incurred since, which were not then provided for.

I assure you, that all the Supplies you give, with what I am able to spare from my own expences, shall be carefully applied to the best advantage for the public service: And I earnestly recommend to you a speedy dispatch, as that, which, under the good Providence of God, we must chiefly depend upon to disapprove the earliest designs of our enemies.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I cannot but tell you how essential it is for attaining those great ends abroad, of which we have so hopeful a prospect, that we should be entirely united at home.

It is plain, our enemies have no encouragement left, but what arises from their hopes of our divisions. It is therefore your concern not to give the least countenance to those hopes.

My inclinations are to be kind and indulgent to you all. I hope you will do nothing to endanger the loss of this opportunity, which God has put into our hands, of securing ourselves and all Europe; and that there will be no contention among you, but who shall most promote the public welfare.

Such a temper as this, in all your proceedings, cannot fail of securing your reputation both at home and abroad.

This would make me a happy Queen, whose utmost endeavours would never be wanting to make you a happy and flourishing People.

The two Houses immediately voted congratulatory addresses; and, the next day, the following one was presented by the Lords:

WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to return our humble and hearty thanks to your Majesty for your most gracious speech to your Parliament.

The kindness and indulgence your Majesty hath expressed for all your subjects; your care to create a perfect union among us, by forewarning us of the mischiefs of divisions; your goodness in declaring your own happiness to depend upon that of your people; your desire to see that happiness settled upon a lasting foundation; your strict regard to treaties; your justice to public engagements, abroad as well as at home; and, your noble concern for the support of the liberties of Europe, comprehend all the Royal qualities, that can be desired in a Sovereign; and when they are all so manifestly united in your Royal person, we, and the whole Nation, should be inexcusable to God and the whole World, to this Age and to Posterity, if we should not endeavour effectually to accomplish all those great and excellent designs, which your Majesty hath so wisely and graciously recommended.

We, for ourselves, faithfully assure your Majesty, that we will do all in our power to bring this Session to a happy and speedy conclusion, and to improve, to the utmost, the blessed opportunity, that God hath put into our hands.

Upon this occasion of approaching your Majesty, we desire humbly to congratulate the great and glorious success of your Majesty's

" mire your wisdom and courage, in sending " that seasonable and necessary assistance to the " Empire; and we cannot too much commend
" the secrecy and bravery, with which your " orders were executed.

" What remains for us to do, is, to be-
" seech God, that the like success may attend
" your Majesty's arms, till you see the Pro-

" of beholding those parts of the world hap-

To this the Queen answered, " I am ve-

" you have expressed in the several particu-

" hearty thanks for your congratulation of " our great success, and for the assurances of

The Address presented by the Commons, the same day, was thus expressed:

Most gracious Sovereign,

" WE your Majesty's most dutiful and " loyal subjects, the Knights, Citizens,
" and Burgesses in Parliament assembled,
" beg leave to return to your Majesty our " most humble and hearty thanks for your " Majesty's most gracious speech from the " throne; and to congratulate your Majesty
" upon the great and glorious success, with " which it hath pleased God to bless your " Majesty in the intire defeat of the united force

" Majesty and your allies, under the com" mand, and by the courage and conduct of " the Duke of Marlborough; and in the victo" ry obtained by your Majesty's fleet, under " the command, and by the courage of Sir
" George Rooke.

" Your Majesty can never be disappointed
" in your expectation from us, your faithful " Commons, who all come disposed to do
" every thing necessary for the effectual pro-

" Majesty may depend upon our providing " such Supplies, and giving such speedy dis-

" tages so happily obtained over the common " enemy, which we can never doubt but " your Majesty's wisdom will improve to the " procuring a lasting security for England, 1704.

" and a firm support for the liberty of Europe."

" We are truly sensible, that nothing can " be more essential for the attaining those " great ends, than to be intirely united at " home. We shall therefore use our utmost " endeavours, by all proper methods, to pre" vent all divisions among us, and will have no " contention, but who shall most promote and " establish the public welfare both in Church " and State. Thus your Majesty's Reign will " be made happy, and your memory blessed to
" all posterity."

The Queen " returned them thanks for the " assurances they gave her of dispatching the " supplies, and avoiding all divisions; both " which, as they were extremely acceptable to " her, so they would be advantageous to them" selves, and beneficial to the public."

particularly, because it spoke in the same terms of the Duke of Marlborough's victories and the advantages gained by Sir George Rooke (1). It was also observed, that the promise, which they made to the Queen, of using their utmost endeavours to prevent all divisions, was in a manner restrained by the addition of all proper methods, which many looked upon as ominous.

However, after the Commons had taken the Supplies services of the army and navy into consideration, *are grant-and, by an unanimous vote, on the 2d of No- Pr. H. C.

vember, desired the Queen to bestow her bounty upon the seamen and land-forces, who had behaved themselves so gallantly, they proceeded to the supply. The several sums they granted for the navy, the army, and other necessary expences, amounted to four millions, six hundred and seventy thousand, four hundred and eighty-six pounds; which they resolved to levy by a land-tax of four shillings in the pound, by continuing the duties on malt, by raising eight hundred and seventy-seven thousand, nine hundred and thirty-one pounds by sale of annuities, and by several other ways and means. They made so great a dispatch, that, on the 9th of December, the land-tax bill received the Royal assent, on which occasion the Queen made a short speech to both Houses, wherein, in particular, she returned thanks to the Commons for their early dispatch of so great a part of the necessary supplies, which she looked upon to be a sure pledge of their affections for her service.

on this occasion: My Lord of Marlborough, before he had had sufficient opportunity of shewing the great-war, been complimented by this very House of Com-

Nation, being then reputed a High-Churchman. But now, that he was thought to look towards the mode-paired with Sir George Rooke's Drunken Battle with the suspended their animosities, and joined in celebrating the successes of her Majesty's arms. But, notwithstanding all the endeavours used by the Ministry to engage the leading-men of the High-Church-party to restrain their zeal, till they might have an opportunity of gratifying it, without obstructing the public business, the Parliament had not sat long, before Mr. William Bromley moved in the House of Commons for leave to bring in that bill. This motion met with great opposition from all the moderate party, among whom appeared many Courtiers, particularly Mr. Henry Boyle, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who spoke strenuously against it. But, though it was carried in the affirmative, yet the chief of the High-Church-party debated several days in their private Assemblies, Whether they should bring in the bill or not? Though many urged strong reasons for the negative, yet the bill was brought in, but moderated in several clauses; for those, who pressed it, were now resolved to bring the terms as low as possible, in order once to carry a bill upon that head. Upon the first reading of it, after a warm debate, the question was carried for a second reading. This vigorous struggle against the bill, even in the House of Commons, made the patrons of it justly apprehensive, that it would never pass by itself through the Lords; and therefore, after a long consultation in their chief meeting, and (as was then whispered) by the suggestion of Mr. Secretary Harley, in whom they still reposed great confidence, but who designed to decoy them into a snare, they resolved to attempt the tacking of it to the Land-tax bill. Accordingly, on the second reading of the Occasional bill, Mr. Bromley made a long speech, wherein, among other things, he urged, "That the practice of Occasional Conformity was such a scandalous hypocrisy, as was no way to be excused upon any pretence whatsoever. That it was condemned even by the better sort of Dissenters themselves. That the employing persons of a different Religion from that established by law had never been practised by any wise Government, and was not allowed even in Holland. That the Sacramental-Test was appointed by the wisdom of the Legislature to preserve the established Church; which Church seemed in as much danger from the Dissenters at this time, as it was from Papists, when the act was made. That this law, being so necessary, and having been twice refused in the House of Lords, the only way to have it pass, was to tack it to a Money-bill. That it had been an ancient practice to tack bills, that were for the good of the subject, to Money-bills, it being reasonable, that, while grievous taxes were laid upon the subject for the support of the Crown, the Crown should, in return, pass such laws, as were for the benefit of the People. That the great necessity there was for the Money-bill's passing, was rather an argument for than against this proceeding. For what danger could there be, that the Lords, who pretended to be such great Patriots, should rather lose the necessary Supplies, than pass an Act so requisite for the preservation of the Church. That, however, if they should suppose them so unreasonable, the matter was not yet so bad, for it was only but proroguing the Parliament for a few days, and

"then the Commons might pass the Land-Tax again without the Tack." He concluded with moving, "That the Bill to prevent Occasional Conformity might be tacked to the Land-Tax bill." This motion occasioned a long and warm debate. The design of the party was, that the Lords should be put under a great difficulty; since if they should untack the Bill, and separate one from the other, then the House of Commons would have insisted on a maxim, which was now settled among them as a fundamental principle never to be departed from, that the Lords cannot alter a Money-bill, but must either pass it or reject it, as it is sent to them.—On the other hand, the Lords could not agree to any such Tack, without departing from that solemn resolution, which was in their books signed by most of them, never to admit of a Tack to a Money-bill; and, if they yielded now, they taught the House of Commons the way to impose any thing on them at their pleasure. The party in the Commons put their whole strength on the carrying this point. They went farther in their design; that, which was truly aimed at by those in the secret, was to break the war, and to force a peace. They knew, that a Bill with this Tack could not pass in the House of Peers; for some Lords even of their own party confessed, that they would never pass it in that manner. By this means money would be stopped; and this would throw all matters into great confusion both at home and abroad, and dispose the Allies, as despairing of any help from England, to accept of such terms as France would offer them. Thus an artful design was formed to break, or at least to shake, the whole Alliance. The Court was very apprehensive of this, and the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin opposed it with much zeal. The party disowned the design for some time, till they had brought up their whole strength, and thought they were sure of a majority. The debate held long: Those, who opposed the Tacking, urged, that it was a change of the whole Constitution, and was in effect turning it into a Commonwealth, for it imported the denying, not only to the Lords but to the Crown, the free use of their Negative in the Legislature. If this was once settled, then, as often as the public occasions made a Money-bill necessary, every thing, which the majority in the Commons had a mind to, would be tacked to it. It is true, some Tacks had been made to Money-bills in King Charles's time; but even those had still some relation to the Money which was given. But in this case a Bill, whose operation was only for one year, and which determined as soon as the four shillings in the pound were paid, was to have a perpetual law tacked to it, which must continue in force, after the greatest part of the Act was expired. Besides these arguments, Mr. Secretary Hedges and the Lord Cutts represented to the House, that the Duke of Marborough had lately concluded a treaty with the King of Prussia for eight thousand of his men, to be employed towards the relief of the Duke of Saxony, who was in most imminent danger. That these troops were actually on their march, upon the credit of a vote of that House. That they would make good her Majesty's treaties: And that the obstructing the Money bills, which the Tacking would infallibly do, would put an immediate stop stop to the march of those troops, and thereby occasion the intire ruin of the Duke of Savoy. The Lord Cutts urged, "That the English Nation was now in the highest consideration abroad: That all Europe was attentive to the resolutions of this Parliament; and that, if any divisions should happen between the two Houses, it would cast a damp upon the whole Confederacy, and give the French King almost as great advantage, as we had gained over him at Blenheim." Mr. Boyle, Chancellor of the Exchequer, spoke on the same side, and asked, "Whether any wife man amongst them would venture his whole estate upon a Vote? And answering himself in the negative, Then, added he, shall we now venture the safety of all England, nay, of all Europe, upon this Vote? Sir John Holt perceiving, that many Members had left the High-Church party, observed, "That for his own part, he had been against this bill from the beginning, but he wondered, that those Gentlemen, who had all along pretended, that the Church of England was on the brink of ruin, unless such a bill should pass, did not pursue the only method, that might secure the passing of that bill. I put it (added he) to the conscience of those Gentlemen, who are come over to us, whether they were before satisfied, as to the reasonableness and necessity of this bill, since now they desert their own friends? I wish they had voted on our side two years ago, for it would have saved us a great deal of trouble, the greatest part of the Nation a great deal of uneasiness, and themselves the confusion of abandoning their party at a pinch."

Sir Thomas Littleton spoke on the same side, and said, "By the tacking of this bill, we mean to throw a necessity upon the Lords to pass it. But suppose the Lords think fit to untack what we have tacked, and to acquaint us that they are ready to pass the Money-bill, but will consider of the other; whose fault will the Nation account it to be, that the Queen's business is retarded?" In answer to all these objections, some precedents were alleged, and the necessity of the bill for the preservation of the Church was urged, which they saw was not like to pass, unless sent to the Lords so accompanied; which some thought was very wittily expressed by calling it a Portion annexed to the Church, as in a marriage; and they said, they did not doubt but those of the Court would exert themselves to get it passed, when it was accompanied with two millions as its price. Upon the division, the Tack was rejected by a majority of two hundred and fifty-one voices against one hundred and thirty-four.

Thus that design was lost by those, who had built all their hopes upon it, and were now highly offended with some of their own party, who had, by their opposition, wrought themselves into good places, and forsook that interest, to which they owed their advancement. These, to redeem themselves with their old friends, seemed still zealous for the bill, which afterwards went on coldly and slowly in the House of Commons, for they lost all hopes of carrying it in the House of Lords, now that the mine they had laid was sprung. However, it was sent up on the 14th of December; and, the next day, it was read for the first time. If the Queen had not been present, there would have been no long debate on that head, for it was scarce possible to say much, that had not been formerly said; but to give her Majesty full information, since it was supposed that she had heard that matter only on one side, it was resolved to open the whole in her hearing. The topics most insisted on were, the quiet, that the Nation enjoyed by the Toleration, on which head the severities of former Reigns were laid open, both in their injustice, cruelty, and their being managed only to advance Popery, and other bad designs. The peaceable behaviour of the Dissenters, and the zeal they expressed for the Queen and her Government, were likewise copiously set forth, while others shewed a malignity to it. That, which was chiefly urged, was, that every new law made in the matter altered the state of things from what it was, when the act for Toleration first passed. This gave the Dissenters an alarm: They might from thence justly conclude, that one step would be made after another, till the whole effect of that act should be overturned. It did not appear, from the behaviour of any among them, that they were not contented with the Toleration they enjoyed, or that they were carrying on designs against the Church. In that case it might be very reasonable to look for a further security; but nothing tending that way was so much as pretended: All went on jealousies and fears, the common topics of sedition. On the other hand, to support the bill, all stories were brought up to shew, how restless and inquiet that sort of men had been in former times. The Archbishop of York declared, "That he was for so much of the bill as concerned the Church." Whereupon the Earl of Peterborough said, "That he was glad to hear that learned Prelate make a distinction between the Ecclesiastical and Political part of the bill; and he hoped, that all the Lords, who, in their consciences, were satisfied, as his Grace seemed to be, that this bill was framed to serve a temporal, as well as a spiritual end, would vote against it." The question being put, whether the bill should be read a second time, it was carried in the negative by a majority of seventy-one voices against fifty; fifty-one Members present, and twenty proxies, being for rejecting it; and thirty-three Peers in the House, and seventeen proxies, for giving it a second reading.

By this time the Lords were engaged in an affair, which made no less noise than the Conformity-bill, and was occasioned by a speech of Lord Haverham; his Lordship having acquainted the Peers, that he had matters of great importance to lay before them, but that he desired it should be in a full House; all the Lords in town and in the neighbourhood were summoned to attend three days after, when his Lordship made a speech, of which these are the most remarkable passages:

"I would be far from detracting or lessening any man's just praise, and do really believe, that the wonderful victory obtained over the French, under the conduct and command of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough, if considered in all its circumstances, especially the unusual secrecy, with which the orders were executed, is the greatest any history can shew us.

" And, though our success at sea was not equal to what it was at land, yet the English courage and bravery shewed itself the same. I cannot indeed congratulate Sir George Rook's intire victory over the French; but I can, and do most heartily, his safe deliverance from them.

" Let our victories be what they will a shore, while France is thus powerful at sea, and more so daily, not only by her new additions, but by our too easy concessions, as were those of St. Christopher's, Newfoundland, and Hudson's-bay; while our trade is thus neglected, and your Lordships faithful and provident advice baffled by the dark counsels of no body knows who; England, in my opinion, can never be safe.

" Another thing, that I shall take notice of, is the present state of the coin; and I dare venture to say, that, if such vast exportations be much longer continued and allowed, we shall have very little left at home. France may be beaten, but England must be beggared. I know we are not so sensible of this, because there is a paper-money now current; but, should there ever happen to be a stop there, I pray God preserve us from sinking all at once.

" The last thing, that I shall mention to your Lordships, is in relation to Scotland. I think I need but lay before your Lordships the true matter of fact to convince you how much it deserves your consideration. A little before the last sitting down of the Parliament there, it was thought necessary to make some alteration in that Ministry; and accordingly some were displaced to make room for others, taking some from each party, who might influence the rest. Things being thus prepared, and a new Ministry set up, the Parliament met about the 6th of July last. And, though the Succession to the Crown in the Protestant line was the main thing recommended with the greatest earnestness by the Queen in her letter to them, yet was it so postponed and baffled, that at length it came to nothing; partly, because the Ministry was so weak and divided, that, instead of doing every thing, they could do nothing; and partly, from a received opinion, that the Succession itself was never sincerely and cordially intended, either by the Ministry there, or by those, that managed the Scots affairs here.

" This is very evident; for, at the opening of the Session, my Lord Secretary himself distinguishes between a secret and revealed Will. And not only that, but upon the fourth Sederunt (as they call it) a motion was made for a Bill of Exclusion; I take it formally to be so, though it bears the title of an Act of Security, which was read the first time on the 7th, and ordered to lie on the table till they heard from England; and, on the 10th, it passed into a law. Now can any reasonable man believe, that those, who promoted a Bill of Exclusion there, or those, who here advised the passing of it, could ever be really and cordially for the English Succession. I know there is an exception in the Act itself; but it is such a one, as might have, full as well, been left out. For he, that asks what, he knows before, will never be granted, only asks the denial. And yet this is not all, but in this very bill of Exclusion, as I call it, all the Heretors and Boroughs are not only allowed, but ordained (as the word is) to be armed, and to exercise their fencible men once every month.

" This being the fact (and, I think, I have stated it very truly) surely, my Lords, it is what deserves your consideration; and I shall make but one or two observations to your Lordships. There are two matters of all troubles; much discontent, and great poverty; and whoever will now look into Scotland, will find them both in that kingdom. It is certain, the Nobility and Gentry of Scotland are as learned and as brave as any Nation in Europe can boast of; and these are generally discontented. And as to the common people, they are very numerous and very stout, but very poor. And who is the man, that can answer what such a multitude, so armed, so disciplined, with such Leaders, may do, especially since opportunities do so much alter men from themselves? And there will never be wanting all the promises and all the assistance France can give.

" Besides this, my Lords, I take it to be of the last danger to England, that there should be the least shadow or pretence of a necessity to keep up regular and standing troops in this kingdom in time of peace; for I shall always be of the same opinion, that what has been, may be. In short, my Lords, I think every man wishes these things had not been; and in my opinion, there is no man, but must say, they should not have been. I shall end with an advice of my Lord Bacon's. Let men, says he, beware how they neglect or suffer matter of troubles to be prepared; for no man can forbid the sparks that may set all on fire.

The Lords were variously affected with this speech; which, though generally approved, as to that part of it, which related to the Scots affairs, yet was it no less unwelcome than unexpected to see the present Ministry reflected upon, to whose counsels and management the Nation owed its prosperity at home, and, in great measure, its successes abroad. And besides, some Peers thought it derogatory to the Duke of Marlborough, that Prince Eugene should be named before him in the mention of an action, in which that Prince acted but a second part. However, this speech was seconded by the Earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham; the former particularly lamenting the ill consequences of the exportation of the coin, and insisting on the necessity of putting a stop to that evil. The Lord-Treasurer, who took this to be an oblique reflection on himself, said, " That, though it would not be difficult to demonstrate, that there never was so great a plenty of money in England, as at present, yet there was a sure way to increase that plenty, and prevent the exportation of coin, and that was by clapping up a peace with France. But then, added he, I leave it to the consideration of any wise man, whether we shall not thereby be shortly in danger of losing, not only all our coin, but all our land to boot."

The Scots business being the most material part of the Lord Haversham's speech, the 29th of November was appointed to consider of it, upon

1704. upon which day the Queen went to the House of Peers, both to hear the debates about that important point, and to moderate by her presence any heats, which might arise (1). This, however, had not all the desired effect; for the Earl of Nottingham, having reflected on King William with relation to the treaty of partition, the Lord Somers rose up and said, "That it was unbecoming a Member of that House to fully the memory of so great a Prince; and he doubted not, but a man, who could reflect on King William before his Successor, would do the same by her present Majesty, when she was gone." As to the treaty mentioned by the Earl of Nottingham, he added, "That there was a noble Lord there present (meaning the Earl of Jersey) who was the principal Agent and Plenipotentiary in that treaty, and whose duty, as well as interest, it was to vindicate both the memory of his late most gracious Master and his own conduct." In the mean time the Lord Moban consulted with several Peers, whether they should move to send the Earl of Nottingham to the Tower. But, this being the first time the Queen did the House the honour of coming to hear their debates, they thought fit to decline that motion out of respect to her Majesty. As to the main business of the day, the Earls of Nottingham and Rochester urged the ill consequences of the Act of Security passed in Scotland: And it being answered, That the same was granted, to prevent the danger of a rebellion in that Kingdom, it was replied, "That, if the Scots had rebelled, they would have rebelled without arms; whereas, if they had a mind to rebel now, this act had legally supplied them with necessities to support their rebellion." The more moderate represented, That, like skilful Physicians and wise Legislators, they ought rather to apply present remedies to a known evil, than to lose time in enquiring, whether or no it might have been prevented. It was after much declaiming moved, That the Lords might pass some votes upon the Scots act. The Tories, who pressed this, intended to add a severe vote against all those, who had advised it; and it was visible at whom this was aimed. The Whigs diverted this: They said, that the putting a vote against an act passed in Scotland looked like the claiming some superiority over them, which seemed very improper at that time; since that Kingdom was possessed with a national jealousy on this head, which would be much increased by such a proceeding. More moderate methods were therefore proposed, in order to the making up of a breach in this Island, with which it seemed to be threatened; and, at last, the Grand Committee of the Peers came to these resolutions, "That the best method to prevent the inconveniencies, which might happen by the late acts passed in Scotland, was by making such laws here for that purpose: That * the Queen be enabled by act of Parliament, on the part of England, to name Commissioners to

* This vote suggested by the Ld. Wharton.

"treat about an Union with Scotland, provided, that these powers be not put in execution, till Commissioners should be named on the part of Scotland by the Parliament there. That Scotsmen should not enjoy the privileges of Englishmen, except such as are settled in this Kingdom, in Ireland, and the Plantations, and such as are or shall be in our land or sea-service, until an Union be had, or the Succession settled as in England. That the bringing of cattle from Scotland into England be prevented. That the Lord Admiral or Commissioners of the Admiralty, for the time being, be required to give orders to her Majesty's ships, to take such ships, as they shall find trading there from Scotland to France, or to the ports of any of her Majesty's enemies; and that Cruizers be appointed for that end. And that the exportation of English wool into Scotland be carefully hindered." These resolutions being approved by the House, the Judges were ordered to reduce them into bills; one of which, for an intire Union, was read a third time, and passed the 20th of December, and sent to the Commons for their concurrence. On the 9th, the Lords presented an address to the Queen, importing, "That, having taken into consideration divers acts of Parliament lately passed in Scotland, and duly weighed the dangerous and pernicious effects, which were likely to follow from them, they were preparing bills for preventing such great evils; and, in the mean time, they thought themselves bound to represent to her Majesty, as their humble opinion, that it was highly requisite for the safety of this Kingdom, that speedy and effectual orders be given for putting of Newcastle into a condition of defence, for securing the port of Fimouth, and for repairing Carlisle and Hull. They also besought her Majesty to cause the militia of the four Northern Counties to be disciplined, and provided with arms and ammunition; and a competent number of regular troops to be kept upon the Northern borders of England, and in the North parts of Ireland: And to direct the laws to be effectually put in execution against all Papists, in respect to their arms and persons, and to order a particular account of what was done, in execution of her commands, to be laid before her Majesty in Council without delay." To this address the Queen answered, "That she should direct a survey to be made of the several places mentioned in this address, in order to lay it before the Parliament: And what forces could be spared from their attendance here, should be quartered upon the borders, as they had been the last year: And that she would likewise give the necessary directions upon the other particulars of the address." The Commons likewise, having in a grand Committee, considered the state of the Nation with regard to Scotland, resolved on the 13th of December, "that a bill should be brought

* This by Lord Moun.

(1) The Queen began this winter to come to the House of Peers upon great occasions to hear their debates, which, as it was of good use for her better information, so it was very serviceable in bringing the House into better order. The first time she came, was, when the debate was taken up concerning the Scotch Act: She knew the Lord Treasurer was aimed at by it, and she diverted the storm by her endeavours, as well as she restrained it by her presence. Burnet Vol. II. 405.

1704. "brought in for the effectual securing the Kingdom of England from the apparent dangers, that might arise from several acts lately passed in the Parliament of Scotland."

And on the 11th of January, Mr. Conyers reported from the Committee of the whole House, to whom it was referred to consider of Heads for that bill, the resolutions they had come to, and which were as follow: "That it be one head of the bill to enable her Majesty to nominate and appoint Commissioners for England to treat with Commissioners from Scotland, for an Union between the two Kingdoms. 2. That all natives of the Kingdom of Scotland, except such as are settled, and shall continue inhabitants of England, or the dominions thereunto belonging, or at present in the service of the army or navy, shall be reputed as Aliens, unless the Succession to the Crown of Scotland be settled on the Princess Sophia of Hanover, and the heirs of her body being Protestants. 3. That a more effectual provision be made to prevent the exportation of wool from England and Ireland into Scotland. 4. That provision be made to prevent the importation of Scots linen into England or Ireland, and to permit the exportation of the linen manufactures of Ireland in English bottoms into her Majesty's plantations in the West-Indies. 5. That immediate provision be made to prevent the conveying of horses, arms, and ammunition, from England into Scotland. 6. That all the Protestant free-holders of the six Northern counties of England be permitted to furnish themselves with arms." These resolutions being read twice, all, except the last, were agreed to by the House, who appointed a Committee to prepare and bring in a bill accordingly; and on the 16th of January, upon the second reading of the Lords bill to the same purpose, it was ordered to lie upon the table, because the Commons were resolved to adhere to a notion, which had now taken such root among them, that it could not be shaken, that the Lords could not put into a bill begun with them any clause, containing Money-penalties, as they had done into this. This notion was indeed wholly new, for Penalties upon transgressions could not be construed to be a giving of Money. The Lords were clearly in possession of proceeding thus; so that the calling it in question was an attempt on the share, which the Lords had in the legislature. On the first of February, the Commons read it a third time, and passed their own bill relating to Scotland; and the following Christmas was the day prefixed for the Scots to enact the Succession, or, on failure thereof, then this act was to have effect. A great coldness appeared in many of the Commons, who used to be hot on less important occasions: They seemed not to desire, that the Scots should settle the Succession; and it was visible, that some of them hoped, that the Lords would have used their bill, as they had used that sent down by the Lords. Many of them were less concerned in the fate of the bill, because it diverted the censure, which they had intended to fix on the Lord-Treasurer. But the Lords were aware of this, and four days after the bill was sent up to them, passed it without any amendment. Those, who wished well to the Union, were afraid, that the prohibition, and the declaring the Scots Aliens after the day prefixed, would be looked on as threatnings; and they saw cause to apprehend, that ill-tempered men in Scotland would use this as an handle to divert that Nation, which was already much soured, from hearkening to any motion, that might tend to promote the Union, or the declaring the Succession. It was given out by those, that this was an indignity done their Kingdom, and that they ought not so much as to treat with a Nation, that threatened them in such a manner. The Marquis of Tweeddale excused himself from serving any longer, upon which the Duke of Argyle was appointed Lord-High-Commissioner in his room.

The Duke of Marlborough, upon his return to England, and first coming to the House of Peers, received the following compliment from the Lord-Keeper in the name of that House:

My Lord Duke of Marlborough,

"THE happy success, that hath attended her Majesty's arms under your Grace's command in Germany the last campaign, is so truly great, so truly glorious in all its circumstances, that few instances in the history of former ages can equal, much less excel the lustre of it.

Your Grace has not overthrown young unskilful Generals, raw and undisciplined troops; but your Grace has conquered the French and Bavarian armies; armies that were fully instructed in all the arts of war, select veteran troops, flushed with former victories, and commanded by Generals of great experience and bravery.

"The glorious victories your Grace has obtained at Schellenberg and Hochstet, are very great, very illustrious in themselves; but they are greater still in their consequences to her Majesty and her Allies. The Emperor is thereby relieved; the Empire itself freed from a dangerous enemy in the very bowels of it; the exorbitant power of France is checked; and, I hope, a happy step made towards reducing of that Monarch within his due bounds, and securing the liberties of Europe.

"The honour of these glorious victories, great as they are, under the immediate blessing of Almighty God, is chiefly, if not alone, owing to your Grace's conduct and valour.

"This is the unanimous voice of England, and all her Majesty's Allies.

"My Lord, This most honourable House is highly sensible of the great and signal services your Grace has done her Majesty this campaign, and of the immortal Honour you have done the English Nation; and have commanded me to give you their thanks for the same. And I do accordingly give your Grace the thanks of this House, for the great honour your Grace has done the Nation, and for the great and signal services you have done her Majesty and this Kingdom, the last campaign."

The Duke's answer was as follows:

My Lords,

"I am extremely sensible of the great honour

The Duke's answer.

1704-5. "nour your Lordships are pleased to do me. I must beg, on this occasion, to do right to all the officers and soldiers I had the honour of having under my command. Next to the blessing of God, the good success of this campaign is owing to their extraordinary courage. I am sure it will be a great satisfaction, as well as encouragement to the whole army, to find their services so favourably accepted."

The same day, a Committee of the House of Commons waited on the Duke, to give him also the thanks of that House.

The French prisoners sent to Nottingham and Litchfield.

Marshall de Tallard, with the other French Generals, being now at the Queen's disposal, she had a fair opportunity of shewing her resentment of the late haughty and contemptuous behaviour of the French towards her Royal person and dignity. For, to omit other insults, it is remarkable, that, when the Lord Cuits was about settling a cartel with their commissioners, they would not allow his title of Lieutenant-General of the Queen of England's forces, but only of the English forces; upon which, the Conferences were broke off. For this, and some other reasons, it was resolved to give the French prisoners some small mortification, by letting them lie two nights on board the Catbarine and William and Mary yachts in the river; and by suffering no person of distinction to have access to them. And it is to be observed, that the Earl of Feverisham having asked the Duke of Marlborough, "Whether he might go and see his old friend Marshall de Tallard?" The Duke told him, That he believed the Queen would not refuse him leave, if he asked it of her: Which the Earl took for a soft denial, and forbore to make any application to see the Marshal, who with the rest of the French prisoners, landed on the 16th of December at Blackwall, where they were magnificently entertained at dinner by Mr. Jackson, and, in the afternoon, set out in several coaches for Barnet, in their way to Nottingham and Litchfield, where her Majesty thought fit they should reside (1). They were accompanied by General Churehill, and attended by a detachment of the Duke of Northumberland's Royal regiment of Horse-guards, who were also ordered to guard them at Nottingham and Litchfield as prisoners, being allowed all manner of freedom, both in those places and ten miles round about.

On the 3d of January, the standards and colours, taken at Blenheim, were set up in Westminster-Hall; and, three days after, the Duke of Marlborough was entertained by the City of London. Two days before, Dr. Delaune, Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, accompanied by several of the heads of Houses, the Proctors, and other principal Members of the University, attended the Queen with a printed copy of the speeches and verses spoken in the Theatre on New-year's day. They presented at the same time an address to her Majesty, importing, "That the exercise, performed in their Theatre, was in honour of the great success of her Majesty's arms the last year in Germany, under the admirable conduct and invincible courage of the Duke of Marlborough; and at sea under the most brave and faithful Admiral, Sir George Rooke; actions as beneficial as they were glorious, by which the Empire was freed from the power of France and treachery of Bavaria, Charles III. possessed of Gibraltar, a happy preface of his speedy Settlement in his Kingdoms, commerce in the Mediterranean secured, and the greatest check, that was ever given to the ambitious designs of France. Concluding with their prayers to God, that he would still reward her Majesty's pious care and concern for the Established Church, by the continuance of victory to her arms." The Queen returned a cold answer to this address, desiring, however, the Vice-Chancellor to let the University know, "how kindly she took this instance of their zeal;" but adding, "that, as they might be assured of her protection, so she would not doubt of their care to encourage those principles, which would promote the peace and welfare of herself and all her subjects." The truth was, that the Duke of Marlborough's friends were greatly offended with an address, which set the actions of the Admiral upon the same level with those of the Captain-General. And, as the University of Oxford spoke the sense of the whole High-Church party, so it was not long before the Court, who now espoused the opposite interest, shewed their resentment of it.

On the 11th of January, the Commons took into consideration the great services performed by the Duke of Marlborough the last summer; and Sir Christopher Musgrave, who, in a former Session, had chiefly opposed a Motion for rewarding the Duke, being now silenced, as it was thought, by a promise of a place for his son, it was unanimously resolved to present an address to her Majesty, expressing "the great sense this House had of the glorious victories obtained by the forces of her Majesty and her Allies under the command of the Duke of Marlborough; and humbly desiring her Majesty to consider of some proper means to perpetuate the memory of the great Services performed by his Grace." The Queen took a few days to consider of this address; and, on the 17th sent the following message to the Commons, "That she inclined to grant the interest of the Crown in the Honour and Manor of Woodstock and Hundred of Wootton, to the Duke of Marlborough and his Heirs; and, the Lieutenantancy and Rangership of the parks, with the rents and profits of the Manors and Hundreds, being granted for two Hereupon the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to enable the Queen to grant the Honour and Manor of Woodstock, and Hundred of Wootton, to the Duke of Marlborough and his Heirs; and resolved to address the Queen to advance the money for clearing the forementioned incumbrances. The Queen not only complied with this address, but likewise ordered the Comptroller of her works to build in Woodstock park a magnificent Palace, called Blenheim-House. The plan of this magnificent building was formed by Sir John Vanbrugh, in which extent and stability seem to be more studied than art and beauty.

By this time Sir George Rooke had been laid aside; and it was publicly declared, that the Lord-High-Admiral had appointed Sir Cloudesly Shovel, Admiral of the White Squadron, to be Rear-Admiral of England, and Admiral and Commander in chief of her Majesty's fleet. Sir John Leake, who had distinguished himself in the late sea-fight, and had been very successful in the seasonable relief of Gibraltar, was at the same time appointed Vice-Admiral of the White Squadron; Sir George Byng, Vice-Admiral of the Blue; Sir Thomas Dilks, Rear-Admiral of the Red; William Whetstone, Rear-Admiral of the White; Sir John Jennings, Rear-Admiral of the Blue, in the room of Sir James Wilsburt, who laid down his Commission.

On the 18th of February, Baron de Spanheim, Ambassador Extraordinary from the King of Prussia, having notified to her Majesty the death of the Queen of Prussia, only daughter to the late Elector of Hanover, by the Princess Sophia, and great grand-daughter of King James I. Some days before this, the House of Commons took into consideration the treaty lately concluded by the Duke of Marlborough, and unanimously resolved, "That an humble address be presented to her Majesty, returning the thanks of this House for concluding the late treaty with the King of Prussia, which was so seasonable a support to the Duke of Savoy, and so great an advantage to the common cause; and also to assure her Majesty, that her faithful Commons would effectually enable her to make good the treaty with the King of Prussia, who, upon so many occasions, had signalized his zeal for the Protestant Religion and Liberty of Europe."

The Commons presented another address to the Queen, "That she would be pleased to use her interest with her Allies, that they might the next year furnish their several compleat quota's both by sea and land, according to their respective Treaties, and to continue her endeavours for an accommodation between the Emperor and his Subjects now in arms in Hungary, in order to the better and more effectual carrying on the present most necessary war." The Queen promised to use her endeavours to obtain a compliance from the Allies with what was desired; and to make application to the Emperor for an accommodation with all imaginable earnestness.

Complaints of the mismanagement both at the board of the Prince of Denmark's Council as Lord-High-Admiral, and at sea, rose now very high. The House of Commons, during the whole continuance of the Parliament, never appointed a Committee to look into those matters, which had been formerly a main part of their care. They saw, that things were ill conducted, but the chief Managers of sea-affairs were men of their party, and that atoned for all faults, and made them unwilling to find them out, or to censure them. The truth was, the Prince was prevailed on to continue still in the Admiralty by those, who sheltered themselves under his name, though this brought a great load on the Government. The Lords proceeded as they had done in the former Session, examining into all Complaints. They named two Committees, the one to examine the books of the Admiralty, the other to consider the proceedings at sea. No progress was made in the first of these; for, though there was a great deal suggested in private, yet, since this seemed to be complaining of the Prince, none would appear directly against him. But the proceedings at sea afforded matter enough, both for enquiry and censure. The most important, and that which had the worst consequences, was, that, though there were twenty-two ships appointed for cruising, yet they had followed that service so remissly, and the orders sent them were so languid and so little urgent, that three diligent cruising ships could have performed all the services done by that numerous fleet. This was made out in a scheme, in which all the days of their being at sea were reckoned up, which did not exceed what three cruisers might have performed. It did not appear, whether this was only the effect of sloth or ignorance, or if there lay any designed treachery at the bottom. It seemed very plain, that there was treachery somewhere, at least among the Under-officers; for, a French Privateer being taken, there were found among his papers instructions sent him by his Owners, in which he was directed to lie in some stations, and to avoid others; and it happened, that this agreed so exactly with the orders sent from the Admiralty, that it seemed it could not be by chance, but that the directions were sent upon sight of the orders. On the 5th of February, the Lords presented an address to the Queen, concerning the mismanagements of the navy, setting forth in particular, "That, for the three last years, the charge of the navy had exceeded what was designed by the Parliament, the sum of above three hundred and sixty-six thousand pounds. That, in the year 1704, one thousand five hundred and sixty-six seamen were wanting to make up the number of thirty-five thousand, who, with the five thousand marines, ought to have been employed at sea, to make up the number of forty thousand men provided for by Parliament. That there were the last year ten ships in sea-pay, viz. three Admirals, three Vice-Admirals, and four Rear-Admirals, and that three of these were not in their ports. That Mr. Churebill, Admiral of the Blue, had not been at sea in any year of this war. That Mr. Graydon, Vice-Admiral of the Blue, had been on shore all this last year: And that Sir James Wilsburt, though a Rear-Admiral, had been the last year Captain to the Admiral of the fleet. That there were two Vice-Admirals of the Red, and two Rear-Admirals of the Blue, but no Vice-Admiral of the White; which, to their Lordships, seemed to have been very irregular, and to have been done in favour of Mr. Graydon, to continue him in the service,"

Complaint of the Admiralty.
Burnet.
Hist. of Europe.

1704-5. "service, although this House had voted, That his behaviour, in letting the four French ships escape, was a prejudice to her Majesty's service, and a great dishonour to the Nation; and that his proceedings in Jamaica had been a great discouragement to the inhabitants of that Island, and prejudicial to her Majesty's Service; and hereupon the Lords had, on the 29th of March last, made an humble address to her Majesty, that Mr. Graydon might not be employed any more in her service; but, having been acquainted, since the report made to them from their Committee, that Mr. Graydon was discharged, they besought her Majesty, that he might be no more employed in her service." After this, their Lordships took notice of "the vast increase of pensions, as appeared by the navy books, particularly, a pension of three hundred and nineteen pounds to Sir John Munden, though he had not done his duty in the expedition to Corunna; whereas the pension to Admiral Nevis's widow had not been paid for two years past; and some Officers of the fleet had been laid aside, without any pension or consideration, though no misbehaviour had been laid to their charge." They farther observed, "That in the ordinary estimate of the navy, there was put down seven thousand pounds for the Prince's Council, though they were only five in number in 1702, five in 1703, and six in 1704; and it did not appear, that more than one thousand pounds a-piece had been paid to them: And that Mr. Churchill's appointments from the navy were, as Prince's Council, one thousand pounds; for pension, five hundred pounds; as Admiral of the Blue, one thousand two hundred and seventy-seven pounds, ten shillings; and for table-money (though not at sea) three hundred and sixty-five pounds; in the whole, three thousand one hundred and forty-two pounds, ten shillings." They likewise represented, "That there was not a sufficient number of proper ships for Cruisers and Convoys;" and they concluded, with "resting assured, that her Majesty would consider of the fittest methods, and give the most effectual orders for restoring and establishing the discipline of the navy, the encouragement of seamen, the guarding of the coasts, and the protection of trade." To this address the Queen made answer, "That it contained many observations, which she would consider particularly, and give such directions upon them, as might be most for the advantage of the public service."

A design was formed in this Session of Parliament, but there was not strength to carry it on at this time. The Earl of Rocheſter gave an hint of it in the House of Lords, by saying, that he had a motion of great consequence to the security of the Nation, which he would not make at this time, but would do it when next they should meet together. He said no more in the House, but in private discourse he owned it was for bringing over the Electors of Hanover to live in England. It seemed not natural to believe, that a party, who had been all along backward at best, and cold in every step, which was made in settling the Succession in that family, should become all on the sudden such converts, as to be zealous for it; and therefore it was not an unreasonable jealousy to suspect, that somewhat lay hid under it. It was thought, that they either knew or apprehended, that this would not be acceptable to the Queen; and they, being highly displeased with the measures she took, went into this design both to vex her, and in hopes that a faction might arise out of it, which might breed a distraction in our Councils, and some of them might hope thereby to revive the Pretender's claim. They reckoned, that such a motion would be popular; and if either the Court or the Whigs, on whom the Court was now beginning to look more favourably, should oppose it, this would cast a load on them, as men, who, after all the zeal they had expressed for that Succession, did now, upon the hopes of favour at Court, throw it up: And those, who had hitherto been considered as enemies of that House, might hope, by this motion, to overcome all the prejudices, which the Nation had taken up against them; and they might create a merit to themselves in the minds of that family, by this early zeal, which they resolved now to express for it. This was set on foot among all the party; but the more sincere among them could not be prevailed on to act so false a part, though they were told, this was the likeliest way to advance the Pretender's interest.

The last business of this Session, with which this Parliament ended, was the case of the Ailsbury men. It has been related, what proceedings had been at law upon the election at Ailsbury. The judgment that the Lords gave in that matter was executed*, and, upon that, five others of the Inhabitants brought their action against the Constables, for refusing their votes. The House of Commons looked on this as a high contempt of their votes, and a breach of their privileges, to which they added a new, and till then, unheard-of crime, that it was contrary to the Declaration† they had made. At the same time they sent their message for these five men (namely, John Paty, John Oviat, John Paton, junr. Henry Basse, and Daniel Herr) and committed them to Newgate, where they lay three months prisoners. They were all the while well-supplied, and much visited, and therefore remained without making any application to the House of Commons. It was not thought advisable to move in such a matter, till all the money-bills were passed; then motions were made, in the interval between the terms upon the statute of Habeas Corpus, but, that statute relating only to commitments by the Royal authority, this did not lie within it.

When the Term came, a motion was made in the Queen's Bench upon the common law, in behalf of the prisoners for a Habeas Corpus. The Lawyers, who moved it, produced the commitment in which their offence was set forth, that they had claimed the benefit of the law, in opposition to a vote of the House of Commons to the contrary. They said, the Subjects were governed by the laws, which they ought and were bound to know, and not by votes of a House of Parliament, which they were neither bound to know nor to obey (1). Three of the Judges

(1) The pleadings of the Lawyers more at large were as follows: Page, Montague, Lechmere, and Den-

1704-5. were of opinion, that the Court could take no cognizance of the matter, and that the prisoners ought to be remanded; but the Chief Justice Holt was of another mind. He thought a general warrant of commitment for breach of privilege, was of the nature of an execution; and, since the ground of commitment was specified in the warrant, he thought it plainly appeared, that the prisoners had been guilty of no offence, and that therefore they ought to be discharged.

Though Holt's judgment seemed clear and solid, yet, as he was but one against three, the majority prevailed, and the prisoners were remanded to Newgate (1). 1704-5.

Upon this, Paty and Oviat, two of the prisoners, moved for a writ of Error, to bring the matter before the Lords. This writ was only to be obtained, by petitioning the Queen, that the judgment of the Court of the Queen's Bench might be brought before her Majesty in Parliament.

There were counsel for the prisoners, and, after reading the return of the commitment, Mr. Page said, "That the writ of Habeas Corpus was a writ grounded on common law, and therefore this court can bail all persons, who by the law of England are bailable. That he did not say, but that the House of Commons hath privileges, which belong to them, and may commit for breach of such privileges: that he now only enquired, if there be any law for the commitment of the prisoners; and therefore the first question he made, was, If there was a breach of privilege returned? Adding, that there being no notice in the return, that the House of Commons has any privilege, he need not argue, whether they have a power, or not, to restrain men from suing in the Queen's Court." The Lord Chief Justice Holt having told Mr. Page, that the question was, If they were not to take notice of their power, tho' not returned to that Court? Mr. Page answered, That, tho' the Court would take notice of any power of the House, yet, that not appearing in the return, they could not judge of it, the commitment being by the Speaker, and not by the House. The Lord Chief Justice replying, that the commitment was in pursuance of the order of the House, Mr. Page rejoined, that then it should be shewn to be by the House, the Speaker being in the chair, which was mentioned in the commitment. But this was overruled by the Lord Chief Justice, who said, that by the House, was to be understood the whole House sitting, with the Speaker in the chair. Mr. Montague continued the same objection to the commitment, adding, that it did not appear, that the prisoners were any ways related to the House of Commons, either as Members or Officers: That, as to the Lord Shaftsbury's case, he was a Member: That he agreed every Court must have power to keep order among themselves; but that to take a man out of the House, who was not of the House, nor guilty of any breach of privilege, for aught appeared, by a return, he knew no law for it: That the cause assigned was, because the prisoners had been guilty of bringing and presenting an action, which he did not take to be a crime by any known law: That, in the case of the Constable of Ailsbury, there was a judgment at law judicially given, which could not be got over, until some act of Parliament interposed; and the law being so, that a man might bring his action, he did not know, what crime a man could be guilty of, who used this law: That the words of his commitment went further, that bringing this action is contrary to the Declaration, in high contempt of the Jurisdiction, and in breach of the known privileges: That they did not know what this word Declaration meant, neither did they understand what this breach of the jurisdiction was: That as to the words, against the known privileges of the House, he was at a loss what action is against the privilege of the House, because they can have no privilege against law, and he was sure it was not against law to bring any action. Then he took notice, that the commitment was during pleasure, adding, that he had known persons committed per mandatum Domini Regis bailed; and therefore by strong reason ought they to be bailed if committed by the House of Commons. Mr. Lechmere enforced what had been alledged by the other two, adding, that one part of the commitment, which set forth the reasons of it, was for bringing an action at law, contrary to the declaration of the House of Commons, in opposition to which declaration, he must alledge the declaration of the Lords: That, this commitment, being also said to be for a contempt of the high jurisdiction of the Commons, the Lords in the case of Ashby and White had declared against it. He then urged, That no other court, save that of the Lords, and the courts at Westminster, and other inferior courts of England, can execute any jurisdiction touching any actions at Law; and that privileges, which are against the known laws of England, are in themselves void. Another objection or exception was, that the continuance of the imprisonment of the prisoners was a new commitment: That the Habeas Corpus is the way, which the Queen takes to make disquisition about the Liberty of her Subjects: That, though both Houses of Parliament are proper judges of their own privileges, yet this court has formerly judged of their privileges; to which purpose he instanced in the Lord Shaftsbury's case, wherein notice is taken of a case, where an original was filed against a Member sitting in the House; and that in the case of the Lord Banbury, though the Lords Temporal and Spiritual had declared he was no Peer, yet in this court, when he was brought to be tried for murder, and denied the jurisdiction here, insisting upon the Peerage, this court refused to try him, and allowed his plea. That the laws of Parliament are the customs of Parliament: That there is no precedent in Parliament to commit a man for prosecuting for his Freehold or Franchise; but on the contrary he believed, that in the Rolls of Precedents there might be found a case, where bail had been allowed by this court upon a commitment of the House of Commons. Mr. Denton excepted to the return of the commitment, alledging, 1. That the Warrant did not sufficiently describe the crime. 2. That it did not appear, that the party committed had notice of the vote or declaration of the House of Commons, for every man is not bound to take notice of a vote, because it is but a temporary thing. 3. That it not appearing by this return, that the prisoner was a Commoner, he might, notwithstanding any thing that appeared to the contrary, be a Lord; and then it must be agreed, the Commons had no jurisdiction. That, if it had been a general commitment, without shewing the offence particularly, and said, for a breach of privilege only, perhaps it had been a good commitment; but here the cause was set forth, and it appeared by the judgment of the Lords in the case of Ashby and White, that was no cause at all of commitment. That bailing the prisoners in this court did not meddle with the privileges of the House of Commons, because, if bailed, yet they are answerable to the House, and are prisoners in custodia Legis. That indeed Justices of the Peace can commit for a riot without bail; but this power arises from an express act of Parliament for that purpose. That the Queen herself cannot commit, so as to bind the power of the law; but this court can, in such cases, and always have, upon good causes shewn, bailed, notwithstanding such commitments.

(1) The Judges delivered their opinions in the following manner: The youngest of them declared, that he thought the prisoners ought to be remanded, alledging, that it was the first Habeas Corpus of the kind,

Feb. 24. ment. The Commons were alarmed at these petitions, and resolved upon an address to the Queen, "setting forth the undoubted right and privilege of the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, to commit, for breach of privilege; and that the commitments of this House are not examinable in any other Court whatsoever; and that no such writ of Error was ever brought, nor doth any writ of Error lie in this case: And that as this House had expressed their duty to her Majesty, in giving dispatch to all the Supplies, so they had an intire confidence in her Majesty's goodness and justice, that she would not give leave for the bringing any writ of Error in this case; which would tend to the overthrowing the undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons of England."

Ten Judges (two only being of another mind) agreed, that, in civil matters, a petition for a writ of Error was a petition of Right and not of Grace. It was therefore thought a very strange thing, which might have most pernicious consequences, for a House of Commons to desire the Queen, not to grant a petition of Right, which was plainly a breach of Law, and of her Coronation-oath. It was no less strange for them to take upon them to affirm, that the writ did not lie, when that was clearly the work of the Judicature to declare, whether it lay or not, which was unquestionably the right of the Lords, who only could determine that. Besides, their having supplied the public occasion, was a strange consideration to be offered to the Queen, as an argument to persuade her to act against law, as if they had pretended, that they had bribed her to intrude the law, and to deny justice; since money, given for public service, was given to the Country and to Themselves, as properly as to the Queen. Her answer to this address was to this effect: "That she was much troubled to find the House of Commons of opinion, that her granting the writs of Error, mentioned in their address, was against their privileges, of which she would always be as tender, as of her own prerogative: And therefore they might depend, she would not do any thing to give them any just occasion of complaint. But, this matter, relating to the course of judicial proceedings, being of the highest importance, she thought it necessary to weigh and consider very carefully, what might be proper for her to do, in a thing of so great concern." This answer was thought so cold, that no thanks were returned for it; though a well-composed House of Commons would certainly have thanked her for that tender regard to law and justice. The same day the answer was reported by Mr. Secretary Hedges, the Commons proceeded to carry their resentments to greater extremities, and having continued sitting till the evening, voted, "That Mr. Francis Page, Mr. James Montague, Mr. Nicholas Lacmère, and Mr. Alexander Denton, in pleading upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, on behalf of the five prisoners committed by this House, were guilty of a breach of privilege;" and ordered them to be taken into custody. As they were apprehensive, left the Queen kind, that ever was brought: That, if this return now before the Court had been of an Habeas Corpus from an inferior Court, it had been a bad return; but that the House of Commons was superior, and could not be bound by the forms of Westminster-Hall, having peculiar laws and customs: That when the Earl of Northumberland petitioned the King, where the question was, Whether the power, that he had raised, was Treason, which petition was ordered to be delivered to the Justices to be considered, the Lords made protestation, that the order thereof belonged to them, and they resolved it not to be Treason. That here was a parallel case: The House of Commons had declared the prisoners guilty of a Contempt; and how could this Court contradict what had been determined by them, who are part of the Legislature, and cannot be supposed to break their trust? Judge Powis was of the same opinion as to the remanding of the prisoners, urging, that this case was not like that of the Lord Shaftsbury. That as to the objection made by the Council, that the prisoners were not Members, he answered, that most commitments by the House of Commons were of other persons, not Members, as for arresting a Member, sitting the House, &c. otherwise they could not vindicate the breach of their privileges. As to what was objected, that this commitment was during pleasure, he replied, That it was more beneficial to have commitments so, that persons so committed might, in the mean time, make application and submit: And that the commitments of the House of Commons were like the commitments of this Court upon contempts, which always were understood not to be for any certain time, and therefore during pleasure. That it was likewise objected at the bar, that the commitment was for bringing an action; to which he answered, that privilege stops; and so it is in all actions brought against any servants of Members sitting the House. And as to the case of Ashby and White, he did not think it to be the same with this case here. That he saw but two things of substance in this argument: The first, That, if this Court, being an high Court, and the highest of all inferior Courts, can discharge any person committed per mandatum Domine Regine, surely then it may discharge one committed by the House of Commons. To which he answered, that he took this to be a fallacy, because the King is to act by his Ministry and by his Courts, and not by his absolute Will: That, according to Lord Coke, though the King be presumed to be present in this Court, yet he doth act by his Judges here, otherwise he might be a Judge and Party. And to the objection, "Whether the Commons should by a declaration direct who should not be sued;" that we must suppose they have a general jurisdiction of privileges, and contempts, and rights, as well as other Courts: That this commitment was not for a trial, but as upon an adjudication, and as a punishment. That, when they came to a point of jurisdiction, they must consider it by usage: That it is next to impossible for the Courts of Westminster-Hall to judge of the privileges of the House of Commons, who have not access to their rolls, where only the privileges of that House are to be seen; and therefore it was very unreasonable to put Judges upon the inquiry. That, if this Court had a jurisdiction over the commitments of the House of Commons, they should have it also over those of the Lords: Concluding, that they were a great Court, but that neither their Ancestors nor They ever yet knew it so great as this would make it. Judge Powell concurred in this opinion, alleging, that he could not think they could be Judges of this return, because the prisoners were committed by another law than this Court proceeded by; and that to commit by one law, and discharge by another, would introduce disorder: That as the Ecclesiastical, Admiralty, and Martial Courts, and the House of Peers proceed by their own rules, so the House of Commons proceed by their own rules; this Court can meddle with their privileges in some cases, but not so as to contradict or oppose them: And that he did not know how the House of Commons could have a power of judging, and not of punishing. That this Court can correct excesses of 1704-5. Queen should grant writs of Error, whereby the five Ailbury men might be discharged from their imprisonment, they also ordered them to be removed from Newgate, and taken into the custody of their Serjeant at Arms; which order was executed at midnight, with such circumstances of severity and terror, as have been seldom exercised towards the greatest offenders. These were such strange and unheard-of proceedings, that by them the minds of all people were much alienated from the House of Commons. But the prisoners were under such management, and so well supported, that they would not submit, nor ask pardon of the House. It was generally believed, that they were supplied and managed by the Lord Wharton. They petitioned the House of Lords for relief, who resolved to proceed in the matter by sure and regular steps. They first came to the following general resolutions: "1. That neither House of Parliament has any power, by any vote or declaration, to create to themselves any new privilege, that is not warranted by the known laws and customs of Parliament. 2. That every Freeman of England, who apprehends himself to be injured, has a right to seek redress by action at law; and that the commencing and prosecuting an action at common law against any person (not intitled to privilege of Parliament) is no breach of the privilege of Parliament. 3. That the House of Commons, in committing to Newgate Daniel Horne, Henry Bais, John Paton junior, John Paty, and John Oviat, for commencing and prosecuting an action at the common law, against the Constables of Ailbury, for not allowing their votes in election of Members to serve in Parliament, upon pretence, that their so doing was contrary to a Declaration, a contempt of the Jurisdiction, and a breach of the Privilege of that House, have assumed to themselves alone a Legislative authority, by pretending to attribute the force of a law to their Declaration; have claimed a jurisdiction not warranted by the Constitution, and have assumed a new privilege, to which they can have no title by the laws and customs of Parliament, and have thereby, as far as in them lies, subjected the rights of Englishmen, and the freedom of their persons, to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons. 4. That every Englishman, who is imprisoned by any authority whatsoever, has an undoubted right, by his agents or friends, to apply for and obtain a writ of Habeas Corpus, in order to procure his liberty by due course of law. 5. That for the House of Commons to censure and punish any person, for assisting a prisoner to procure a writ of Habeas Corpus, or by vote, or otherwise, to deter men from soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading upon such writ of Habeas Corpus in behalf of such prisoner, is an attempt of dangerous consequence, a breach of the many good statutes provided for the liberty of the subject, and of pernicious example, by denying the necessary assistance to the prisoner, upon a commitment of the House of Commons, all inferior Courts, but not of the Parliament, which is superior. That, supposing the Lords would intermeddle with freeholds, though, perhaps, they are not less valuable than their privileges, yet this Court could not prohibit them. That he believed it as customary to make commitments during pleasure as otherwise. That, if we had a long Parliament as formerly, then perhaps it would have been hard. That Bondage was so much lost in England, that he believed the Council had almost forgot how to apply that argument. That he did not know how excess of jurisdiction in either House can be good. If it happens, it must be determined by Conference between themselves. That if it should be supposed, that both should insist, and the Commons should do any thing unreasonable, sure then the people of England would not chuse them again: And, if the Lords should insist upon unreasonable privileges, then the people of England, he believed, would find out a way to chuse such an House, or use such methods, as would rectify and oblige to a submission. These three Judges having thus declared their sentiments, "That the prisoners ought to be remanded," the Lord Chief Justice Holt delivered his opinion, "That they ought to be discharged. I am sensible, said he, of the great disadvantage I lie under, because eleven of the Judges are against my opinion. The case being of moment and concern, I did desire to confer with them, before I delivered my thoughts. And it is a second disadvantage, that I have so great an esteem for their sentiments, that I would willingly resign my opinion to theirs. But then I lie under another, which is to encounter an opinion and judgment of the House of Lords. I must confess, the commons of England are intrusted with, and are very zealous for our liberties; and therefore I would think it a misfortune to lie under their displeasure. Yet there is another thing, which lies upon me, which, at all events, I am to take care of, and that is a good conscience. I am upon my oath to judge impartially and justly. I do not think this such an imprisonment, that the freemen and subjects of England are to be bound by; and it will affect all the Kingdom, if, by any declaration or prohibition made by the House of Commons, they are restrained from bringing a lawful action. Neither of the Houses of Parliament, separately or jointly, have any power to dispose of the liberty or property of the subject. It must be, with the Queen added. This is the Constitution of the English Government. It is said in the return, that the prisoners are guilty of a breach of privilege for bringing an action. I must therefore declare my opinion, that commencing a suit is no breach of privilege, though it be against a Member himself, so he be not affected in his person or lands. The second crime mentioned in the commitment and return is prosecuting. What is meant thereby seems not to be so clear, because prosecuting may be taken several ways, as entering of a continuance, which cannot be said to be any breach of privilege, the person of the Member, or his estate, not being disturbed thereby. Indeed, if you distrain the person of a Member, or do any act to restrain his liberty, then it is a breach, and punishable by the House. Again, the House of Commons should have shewn, that they have a privilege; for, if the High-Constable of England should not shew his authority, we should not take more notice of him than of the Constable of St. Martin's. The law of the land must take place. A man may legally commence and prosecute an action against a man, that is not privileged, though vexatious or wrong, as appears by 2 Ric. III. 9. where all the Judges were of opinion, that there was no punishment for bringing an action, though wrong. If an action is sued and prosecuted against a Peer, no action de scandalis magnatum will lie, if there was any probable cause of action. I do not think, that any instance can be shewn, that ever privilege did extend so far, as to exclude or debar any man from bringing any action, but especially where there is just cause. This case has undergone a great and high judgment above upon the Queen's 1704-5. "mons, which has ever been allowed upon all commitments by any authority whatsoever.

 "And, 6. That a writ of Error is not a writ of Grace, but of Right, and ought not to be denied to the subject when duly applied for (though at the request of either House of Parliament) the denial thereof being an obstruction of justice, contrary to Magna Charta."

Feb. 28. These resolutions being delivered to the Commons at a Conference, they took time to consider of them till the 7th of March, upon which day, at their desire, a second conference was held, wherein the Commons delivered a long answer, in which they set forth, that the right of determining elections was lodged only with them; and that therefore they only could judge who had a right to elect: That they only were judges of their own privileges, and that the Lords could not intermeddle in them. They quoted very copiously the proceedings in the year 1675, upon an appeal brought against a Member of their house; and urged, that their prisoners ought only to apply to them for their liberty; and that no motion had ever been made for a writ of Error in such a case.

The Lords, upon this, desired a free Conference, which was held with the Commons on the 9th of March; but that it ended without success, was not surprizing, considering the temper, with which the Commons came to it, and which appeared from the votes they made the day before, after they had agreed to the free Conference. For, upon information, that their Serjeant at Arms had been served with two writs of Habeas Corpus, returnable before the Lord-

Keeper, in behalf of Mr. Montagu and Mr. Denton, two of the Gentlemen, who had been of Council for the five prisoners, they came to these resolutions, "That no Commoner of England, committed by the House of Commons for breach of privilege, or contempt of that House, ought to be by any writ of Habeas Corpus made to appear in any other place, or before any other Judicature, during that Session of Parliament, wherein such person was so committed. That the Serjeant at Arms attending that House do make no return, nor yield any obedience to the said writs of Habeas Corpus; and, for such his refusal, that he have the protection of the House of Commons. And that the Lord-Keeper be acquainted with the said Resolutions, to the end that the said writs of Habeas Corpus might be superseded, as contrary to law and the privilege of the House." Five days after, the Commons ordered the report of the free Conference, which was made by Mr. Bromley, to be entered upon their Journals; and resolved, "That the proceedings of the House, in relation to the Ailbury men committed by the House for breach of privilege, and the other proceedings of that House in that matter, were in maintenance of the ancient undoubted rights and privileges of the Commons of England." And they ordered all the proceedings in relation to the Ailbury men, the report of the Lords Journals, and the report of the Conferences, and of the free Conference, to be printed. The next day, the Lords attended the Queen with a full Representation of the whole

March 13;

"Queen's writ of Error. My brother Powis says, that he does not know, that this is the same case with that of Ashby and White. But if he will look upon the return, he will be soon satisfied, that it is. Another part of the return says, That the prosecution was contrary to the declaration, and in breach, &c. I do not well know, what is meant by a prosecution contrary to a declaration: But suppose there was a declaration, I much question, if that declaration will make that a breach of privilege, which was not so before. There is no precedent for it; and, if any man can bring such a precedent, it will go a great way with me. Privilege is not unlimited, but established by the rules of law. If a Member break the peace, he must find sureties; or, if he commit high-treason or felony, sitting the House, he must answer. If the declaration does claim a privilege, and says it is so; yet, if it was not so before, the people of England are not estopped to say it is so; so neither the one House, nor the other, can enlarge their privileges. They concern the liberties of a people in a high degree; and nothing but an act of Parliament can make a man's person subject to imprisonment, but where originally he was so subject. The reason why Judges do not give their opinions to the Lords about their privileges is, because it is lex parliamenti; and the Lords themselves, being always there, are presumed to know their privileges best themselves. But, whenever the question is about privilege in Westminster-Hall, we must judge of it according as it appears to us, and according to the law of the land. Suppose in this case the House of Commons had not interposed; the Plaintiffs had gone on, and the Defendants had pleaded the whole matter of the privilege specially, and the Plaintiffs had demurred, we then should have judged of it, because it would have been a plea to the jurisdiction of the Court. All appears upon record now before the Court, and therefore we are to judge of it as much as if it had been pleaded. The Parliament-law of privilege is lex terra, as much as any law used in Westminster-Hall; and my Lord Clarendon gives us an account of privilege in the first volume of his history, p. 310, 311, 312. If it was privilege in the House before, then how comes it, that Ashby was not committed, who was the ring-leader, but is still at liberty? Another observation upon this return is, that they do not say for a breach, but in breach; neither do I see, how bringing an action at law in one Court, is in contempt of another Court. This Court here can hold plea in any action whatsoever. The House above cannot award process there; and then I cannot see, how a man suing here can be guilty thereby of a breach of the privileges of that Court. These words are terrible, and would frighten men, when said, In contempt of the privileges of the House of Commons, because every man is bound to maintain them in their lawful privileges. No doubt but they can commit in any case of privilege, as for a contempt committed in their Court: But when the fact is mentioned, and the cause is a just action at law, no doubt but the proceeding in such action is just, and no contempt; such an action being grounded on the common law. As to my Lord Shaftsbury's case, it was for facts done in the House; and the House may at any time commit a man for a contempt in the face of the House: Whereas the prisoners are committed, not for a breach of privilege or contempt, but because they have brought their actions, which are legal, and so adjudged by the Lords in the writ of Error. To conclude, the case of the Lord Banbury is considerable with me: He petitioned the House of Lords to sit, and also to have the King's leave. The Lords determined he was not a Lord; yet when he was brought upon an Indictment by the name of Charles Knowler, Esq; he here pleaded and insisted, that he was a Peer; which plea was allowed, and he was not tried." But notwithstanding the Chief Justice's opinion, the Prisoners were remanded.

1704-5. whole thing, wherein having recited the matter of fact relating to this affair, they laid before her, "That the proceedings of the House of Commons against the Atisbury men were wholly new and unprecedented. That it is the birth-right of every Englishman, who apprehends himself to be injured, to seek for redress in her Majesty's Courts of Justice. That if there be any power, that can controul this right, and can prescribe when he shall, and when he shall not, be allowed the benefit of the laws, he ceases to be a freeman, and his liberty and property are precarious. That the Crown lays claim to no such power, and their Lordships were sure the law has trusted no such authority with any subjects whatsoever." They urged, "That in former times the opinion of the House of Commons was very different from what it was at present," of which their Lordships gave several instances; and they concluded with an humble request, "That no importunity of the House of Commons, or any other consideration whatsoever, might prevail with her Majesty to suffer a stop to be put to the known course of Justice, but that she would be pleased to give effectual orders for the immediate issuing of the writs of Error."

This representation was thought so well drawn, that some preferred it to those of the former Sessions; it contained a long and clear deduction of the whole affair with great decency of style, but with many heavy reflections on the House of Commons*.

* See Pr. H. L. II. 126, 144. By this time the whole business of the Session was brought to a conclusion; for the Lords, who had the money-bills, would not pass them till this was ended. The Queen, in answer to their representation, told them, "That she should have granted the writs of Error, they desired, but that, finding an absolute necessity of putting an immediate end to this Session, she was sensible there could have been no further proceedings upon that matter." This answer being reported to the House of Lords, was looked on by them as a clear decision in their favour, and therefore they ordered, "That the humble thanks of their House be immediately presented to her Majesty for her most gracious answer, in which she had expressed so great a regard to the judgment of their House, so much compassion to the prisoners, and such tenderness to the rights of the subject."

About an hour after, the Queen came to the House of Lords, and, after passing the bills, ended the Session with the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's speech at the end of the first Parliament. Pr. H. C. III. 441. I Cannot put an end to this Session, without doing you the justice to acknowledge, you have fully made good the assurances you gave me at the beginning of it, by the great readiness you have shewn in the dispatch of the public business. And I make no doubt, but this dispatch will prove a real advantage to us, and a great discouragement to our enemies.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I return you my hearty thanks in particular for the great Supplies with which you have enabled me to carry on this necessary war. I assure you, they shall be carefully applied to the uses, for which they have been given; and I persuade myself, I shall always have the cheerful assistance of my dutiful and loving subjects, in the prosecuting of the present war, till our enemies are obliged to such a peace, as shall be a lasting advantage and security to Us and our Allies.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We have, by the blessing of God, a fair prospect of this great and desirable end, if we do not disappoint it by our own unreasonable humour and animosity, the fatal effects of which we have so narrowly escaped in this Session, that it ought to be a sufficient warning against any dangerous experiments for the future."

"I conclude therefore with exhorting you all to Peace and Union, which are always commendable, but more particularly necessary at this time, when the whole Kingdom being shortly to proceed to new elections, it ought to be the chief care of every body, especially of such as are in public stations, to carry themselves with the greatest prudence and moderation. Nothing will contribute more to our reputation abroad, and our security at home."

Then the Lord-Keeper, by her Majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament to Thursday the 1st of May following.

The narrow escape, intimated by the Queen in her speech, was universally understood to be meant of the Tack, as indeed it could be meant of nothing else.

Thus this Session, and with it this Parliament, came to an end. It was no small blessing to the Queen and to the Nation, that they got so well out of such hands. They had discovered on many occasions, and very manifestly, what lay at the bottom with most of them; but they had not skill enough to know how to manage their advantages, and to make use of their numbers. The constant successes, which had attended the Queen's Reign, put it out of their power to compass that, which was aimed at by them, the forcing a peace, and consequently the delivering up all to France. Sir Christopher Muirgrave, the wisest man of the party, died before the last Session; and by their conduct after his death it appeared, that they wanted his direction. He had been at the head of the opposition, that was made in the reign of King William from the beginning to the end; but he gave up many points of great importance in the critical minute, for which there were good grounds to believe, that he had twelve thousand pounds from that King at different times. At his death he appeared to be much richer than by any visible computation he could be valued at; which made some cast an imputation upon his memory, as if he had received great sums even from France.

Before we take leave of this Parliament, it will be proper to take notice of some things, which were begun, but not finished in it. There was a bill offered for the Naturalization of some hundreds of Frenchmen, to which the Commons added a clause, disabling the persons so naturalized

Bills not passed. Burnet.

1704-5. lized from voting in elections of Parliament. The true reason of this was, that it was observed, that the French in England gave in all elections their votes for those, who were most zealous against France; and yet, with an apparent dissimulosity, some of the Members gave it as a reason for such a clause, that they must be supposed so partial to the interests of their own country, that it was not fit to give them any share in the Government. The Lords looked on this as a new attempt, and the clause added was a plain contradiction to the body of the bill, which gave them all the rights of natural born subjects; while this took from them the chief of them all, the chusing their Representatives in Parliament. They would not therefore agree to it, and the Commons resolved not to depart from it; so that, without coming to a free Conference, the bill fell with the Session.

Another bill was begun by the Lords against the Papists. It was occasioned by several complaints brought from many parts of the Kingdom, especially from Cheshire, of the practices and insolence of those of that Religion. A bill therefore was ordered to be brought in with clauses in it, which would have made the act, passed against them four years before, prove effectual, which, for want of these, had hitherto been of no effect at all. This passed the Lords, and was sent to the Commons, who had no mind to pass it, but, to avoid the ill effects of their refusing such a bill, they added a clause to it (1), containing severe penalties on Papists, who should once take the oaths, and come into the Communion of the Church of England, if they should be guilty of any Occasional Conformity with Popery afterwards. They imagined, that this of Occasional Conformity was so odious to the Lords, that every clause, that condemned it, would be rejected by them. But when they came to understand, that the Lords were resolved to agree to the clause, they would not put it to that hazard; and therefore the bill lay on their table till the prorogation.

A general self-denying bill was offered by those very men, who, in the first Session of Parliament, when they hoped for places themselves, had opposed the motion of such a bill with great indignation. Now the scene was a little altered; they saw they were not like to be Favourites, and therefore pretended to be Patriots. This looked so strangely in them, that it was rejected; but another bill of a more restrained nature passed, disabling some Officers, particularly those, who were concerned in the Prize-Office, from serving in Parliament. To this a general clause was added, that disabled all, who held any office, that had been created since the year 1684, or any officer that should be created for the future, from sitting in Parliament. This bill had a quick and easy passage among the Commons, being brought in on the 16th of January, and sent up to the Lords on the 23d of that month, who did not think fit to agree to so general a clause, but consented to a particular disability put on some offices by name. The Commons did not agree to this alteration; but insisted on the whole, and therefore the bill fell.

Among the many ways and expedients, by which the Tory-party of the House of Commons endeavoured to secure their interest against a new election, they thought it necessary to procure an act, whereby the Commissions of the Peace should be lodged in the hands of men of estates; and thereupon a bill was brought in, and passed on the 2d of February, for qualification of Justices of Peace; but, the same being sent up to the Lords, they did not think fit to give it their concurrence.

On the 5th of April, the Parliament, according to the Triennial act, being near expiring, a Proclamation was issued out for dissolving it; and, on the 23d, another was published for calling a new Parliament (2).

The conclusion of the Parliament set the whole Nation in a general ferment; both parties studied how to dispose the minds of the people in the new elections, with great industry and zeal.

The affairs of Europe were now thought in such a situation, that the war could not run beyond the period of the next Parliament. A well-chosen one must prove a public blessing, not only to England, but to all Europe; as a bad one would be fatal at home, as well as to the Allies abroad. France was now reduced to great Exigencies. All methods of raising money were so much exhausted, that they could afford no great Supplies; so that, in imitation of our Exchequer bills, they began to give out Mint bills; but they could not create that confidence, which is justly put in Parliamentary credit. The French had hopes from their party in England; and there was a disjoining in the several Provinces of the United Provinces; but, as long as England continued firm and united, it had a great influence on the States, at least, to keep things entire during the war. It was visible, therefore, that a good Election in England must

(1) It was as follows: "Provided always, that all persons, who, by virtue of this act, shall be obliged to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribe the declaration, shall, at the same time, declare himself to be a Member of the Church of England, as now by law established; such declaration to be entered on the same roll, where the said oaths and declarations, so to be taken and subscribed, are to be entered. And in case any such persons shall, after their taking such oaths, and making such declarations, as aforesaid, knowingly and wilfully resort to, or be present at any Conventicle, Assembly, or Meeting, under colour or pretence of any exercise of Religion, in other manner, than according to the Liturgy and Practice of the Church of England, in any place within this Kingdom, he "shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds, for every time he shall be present at such Assembly, Conventicle, or Meeting."

(2) On the 10th of April, the Queen, with his Royal Highness, went to Newmarket. Two days after, Dr. Ellis, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, waited on her, and desired her to honour them with her presence at dinner. The Queen having accepted the invitation, was magnificently entertained in Trinity-College-Hall. Eleven Noblemen were made Doctors of Law, and Pellet, Arbuthnot, and Vernon, Doctors of Physic. James Montague, Council for the University, the Vice-Chancellor, and the famous Isaac Newton, Mathematical Professor, were knighted.

1705. give such a prospect for three years, as would have a great influence on all the affairs of Europe.

*Protest-ings in the
tion.*

The Convocation sat at the same time with the Parliament, though it was then so little considered, that scarce any notice was taken of them; and they deserved that no mention should be made of them. As the House of Commons thought fit, in their address at the beginning of the Session, to put the successes by sea and land on a level, the Lower-House of Convocation were resolved to follow their example, and would have the sea and land both mentioned in the same terms; but the Bishops would not vary from the pattern set them by the House of Lords, so no address was made by the Convocation. The Lower-House continued to proceed with much indecent violence, and brought up injurious and reflecting addresses to the Upper-House, which gave a very large exercise to the patience and forbearance of the Archbishop and Bishops. On December 1, they presented another representation, signifying their grief at the general complaint of the Clergy, that, though Convocations had been held now for some years, after a long discontinuance, yet the public had not hitherto reaped the Benefits that might be expected: That this tended to disparage the Constitution of the Church, and tempted some to speak against the necessity and usefulness of Ecclesiastical Synods. They promise, for time to come, to do what they can to silence that complaint: And intimate, that the fault did not lie in them that more had not been done. That the unhappy disputes between the two Houses had been their hindrance, but that they neither raised them, nor omitted any means they could contrive for bringing them to a regular determination. They begged leave again to take notice, of the many pernicious books that were published and dispersed, and requested their Lordships (as formerly) to use their interest in Parliament for a bill to repress the licentiousness of the press. They represented also the increasing difficulties of the Parochial Clergy, about administering the Holy Sacrament indifferently to all persons that demand it, in order to qualify themselves for offices; because they saw not how they could in several cases act conformably to the Rubricks and Canons of the Church, in repelling such persons as were unworthy, and particularly notorious Schismatics, without exposing themselves to vexatious and expensive suits at law. They begged they would use their interests for the freeing them from these difficulties, and, in the mean time, give them directions how to behave themselves under such exigencies. The Archbishop and Bishops made large remarks on this paper. They observe, that it was not directed to the President, whom they had endeavoured to deprive of his ancient title. They tell them, that it is they, who, by their unwarrantable claims and encroachments, made it impossible for the Convocation to do the Church any service. That, should their innovations run on, there would be a new danger of Presbytery; for Presbyters were enabled hereafter to bid defiance to their Ecclesiastical Superiors, and to act independently from them in the highest and most general concerns of the Church. That it is strange any of the Clergy should understand so little of the Constitution, as to complain, that no business is finished, when the Royal licence has not enabled to begin any: Or, that they should hope, that an attempt to do business, while this was wanting, could have any other effect than the increasing differences. For that they would be still running into irregular practices, against which their brethren would enter their protestations, and against which their Lordships must find some other method of proceeding. That their Lordships could not but look upon the seeming earnestness of the Clergy to proceed to business, as a design to render themselves popular, and their Superiors odious: And that it was dangerous to those whom they represented. That in 1689 the Lower-House was for superseding all business with a Royal licence in their hands, &c. That there are Laws and Canons in being sufficient to correct and punish offenders. That, if any thing hindered discipline, it was the reproaches industriously spread amongst the Clergy against the Bishops and their Proceedings. That the present disputes grew purely from the attempts of some of the Clergy to disengage themselves from the authority of the Bishops, by privileges, which their predecessors never claimed nor pretended to, and therefore they were amazed at their solemn contrary declaration. The steps the Bishops had taken are reckoned up, by which they had testified their desire of peace and good agreement. That the Convocation has really no authority to pass such censures upon books as they desired: That grievances of the Clergy may be regularly offered by their Representatives in Convocation. But that it is without precedent for Presbyters to expect, that their Metropolitans and Bishops should be accountable to them for their conduct and behaviour in their several Visitations. And that, as concerning directions about their refusal of the Holy Sacrament to unworthy persons, they could give them no better than the Rubricks and Canons of the Church, which he, that would strictly and religiously observe, could not be wanting, either in a dutiful regard to his Superiors, or in a conscientious care of the Flock. The Lower-House sent up two other papers, in one of which they complain of the Dissenting Teachers presuming to administer Baptism in private Houses, and of the increase of non-licensed schools and seminaries; and in the other they accuse the Bishop of Sarum of insinuating, that many of the persons, concerned in preparing their representation of grievances last winter, were enemies to their Lordships, the Queen, and the Nation.*

As the Lower-House still held their intermediate Sessions, the Archbishop, on February 14, his Triennial Visitation, 1704. asked the Prolocutor, if they had held any intermediate Sessions since the last Synodical day: The Prolocutor answered, they had held one the Monday before. The Archbishop told him it was very irregular, and that he admonished them to hold no more intermediate Sessions, which was a violation of the President's right, and contrary to the constant custom of Convocations.

February 23. The Prolocutor told the Archbishop, that their House had taken his admonition into consideration; and represented in return, that they had not been guilty of any irregularity by their intermediate Session; that the holding such Sessions, as oft as they shall see cause, is no violation of the President's right,

* Alluding to his charge at his Triennial Visitation, 1704.

1705. nor contrary to the custom of Convocations, but an unquestionable right of the Lower-House, from which they could not depart. And that, if the admonition was intended as judicial, they protested against it as void and null, and of no effect in law, and to which no obedience can be due: And desired, that this their answer and protestation (for which they were ready to assign their reasons) might be entered in form by the Register in the acts of the day.

However this put a stop to their intermediate meetings, for they would not venture on the censures, that must in course follow, if no regard was had to the Admonition. On March 15, at the final prorogation, the Archbishop dismissed them with a wise well-composed speech. He told them, that, whereas they had brought up many complaints, the greatest part of them did not require any answer, after so many former expressions of the judgments and resolutions of the Bishops concerning them. That their paper, of December 1, was of so undutiful a nature, that it might justly be accounted an act of clemency in their Lordships to pass it by without censure: And yet they drew up observations upon it, and entered them in their Register, and they might be seen by any one that desired it. That there is no such thing as adjournments, in the language or practice of Convocations, and that prorogations have been all along managed by Commissioners, from the Restoration to the Revolution. That their representation concerning unlicensed schools and seminaries was a matter of law. That their former complaints against the Bishop of Sarum had not sufficient ground. That, in what they now complained of, the Bishop referred to flying reports set about to the prejudice of the Upper-House, which they had all reason to complain of; though they prayed God to forgive the guilty, and pitied those who were led away by wilful and perpetual misrepresentations. That their Lordships would govern themselves by the Articles and Rubrics, the Canons and Statutes; and that they knew no way of retrieving the honour of Convocations, but by the departing of the Clergy of the Lower-House from unwarrantable claims and innovations, and returning to the antient Canonical methods.

He added, that this Convocation was near an end, and a new one would probably be summoned: And that, if new occasion should be offered, he should think himself obliged to exert his authority, seeing no better fruit had been reaped from his past conduct, which some ascribed to fear, and others to remissness. And he told them, he wished, that the Clergy of the next Convocation might govern themselves by the Constitution as it is, and not as they would desire it might be; that they might not divide in two that body of the Convocation, which is but one; but prevent all irregularities, and thereby all censure, by meeting together with such peaceable tempers and dutiful dispositions, as became their function and order.

The governing men among the Lower-House were headstrong and factious, and designed to force themselves into preferments by the noise they made, and by this ill humour, that they endeavoured to spread among the Clergy, who were generally soured, even with relation to the Queen herself, beyond what could be imagined possible.

Before the Queen went to Cambridge, she resolved at last to fill the See of St. David's, which had now been long vacant. Dr. Bull was promoted to it in the room of Dr. Watson, deprived for his enormities (1). Bull had writ the most learned treatise, the age had produced, of the doctrine of the primitive Church, concerning the Trinity. This treatise had been so well received all Europe over, that, in an Assembly General of the Clergy of France, the Bishop of Meaux was desired to writ over to a correspondent he had in London, that they had such a sense of the service he had done their common faith, that upon it they sent him their particular thanks: I read the letter, says Burnet, and so I can deliver it for a certain truth, how uncommon soever it may seem to be. The Queen had, a little before this, promoted Dr. Beveridge to the See of St. Asaph, who had shewed himself very learned in the Ecclesiastical knowledge. They were both pious and devout men, but were now declining; both of them being old, and not like to hold out long. Soon after this, the See of Lincoln became vacant by that Bishop's death, and Dr. Wake (late Archbishop of Canterbury) was promoted to it. He was a man eminently learned, an excellent writer, a good preacher, and, which is above all, a man of an exemplary life.

It was no small mortification to the High-Church party, that the Duke of Buckingham was removed, and the Privy-Seal given to the Duke of Newcastle, whose interest was great with the Whigs.

(1) Watson's affair was debated this last Session in the House of Lords, which the Queen came to hear in person. His business had been kept long on foot in the Courts below, by all the methods of delay that Lawyers could invent: After five years pleading, the concluding judgment was given in the Exchequer, that he had no right to the temporalities of that Bishoprick: And that, being affirmed in the Exchequer-chamber, it was now by a writ of error brought before the Lords in the last report: But, as the House seemed now to be set, he had no mind to let it go to a final decision: So he delayed the assigning the errors of the judgment, till the days were lapsed, in which, according to a standing order, errors ought to be assigned upon a writ of error; in default of which, the record was to be sent back. He suffered the time to lapse, though particular notice was ordered to be given him, on the last day, in which, according to the standing order, he might have assigned his errors: And the House sat that day some hours on purpose waiting for it. Some weeks after that, when the Session was so near an end, that he thought his cause could not be heard during the Session, and so must in course have been put off to another Session, he petitioned for leave to assign his errors: This was one of the most solemn orders, that related to the judicature of the Lords, and had been the most constantly stood to: It was not therefore thought reasonable to break through it, in favour of so bad a man, of whom they were all ashamed, if parties could have any shame: He had affected, in every step he had made, to seek out all possible delays, for keeping the See still void, which, by reason of a bad Bishop and a long Vacancy, was fallen into great disorder: Yet, after all this, he had still by law the benefit of a writ of error, which he might bring in any subsequent Session of Parliament. For which reason the Queen resolved to fill the See.

The Lord Cutts was appointed to command the forces in Ireland under the Duke of Ormond; but this seeming preferment was, in reality, a kind of disgrace, for his Lordship would gladly have changed this command for an equivalent in the service abroad. The Earl of Montague was created Marquis of Mounthermer, and Duke of Montague.

Before the operations of the campaign are related, it will be necessary to give an account of the proceedings in the Parliaments of Scotland and Ireland.

The affairs of Ireland.
Burnet.
Hist. of Eng.

In Ireland, the new heat among the Protestants there, raised in the Earl of Rochester's time, and connived at, if not encouraged by the Duke of Ormond, went on still: A body of hot Clergymen, sent from England, began to form meetings in Dublin, and to have emissaries and a correspondence over Ireland, on design to raise the same fury in the Clergy of that Kingdom against the Dissenters, that they had raised here in England: Whether this was only the effect of an unthinking and ill-governed heat among them, or if it was set on by foreign practices, was not yet visible. It did certainly serve their ends, so that it was not to be doubted, that they were not wanting in their endeavours to keep it up, and to promote it, whether they were the original contrivers of it or not; for indeed hot men, not practised in affairs, are apt enough, of their own accord, to run into wild and unreasonable extravagances.

The Parliament met at Dublin the 5th of March, and voted a hundred and fifty thousand pounds for the support of the necessary branches of the Establishment. A few days after, the Lower-House of Convocation of the Clergy of the Church of Ireland being informed, That heads of a bill, for the better improvement of the hempen and flaxen manufactures of that Kingdom, were brought into the House of Commons, wherein there was a clause to ascertain the March 12. tythes of hemp and flax: They presented a memorial to the House of Commons, desiring, that the clause might not pass in the bill, being, as they apprehended, very prejudicial to the rights and properties of the Clergy of Ireland, with the care of which they were intrusted. This message was signed by the Prolocutor, and delivered by their Actuary, who was a servant to the Upper-House of Convocation. Upon the receipt of the memorial, the Commons, instead of appointing a time for hearing their reasons upon it, voted the person, that brought it, guilty of a breach of the privilege of the House; and, ordering him to be taken into custody, further resolved, "That it appeared to them, that the Convocation, in pretending to have the care of the civil rights of the Clergy, were guilty of a contempt and breach of "the privilege of that House." The Commons expected, that the Convocation should make a submission, and acknowledge, "That they had nothing to do with the civil rights; and that their meddling with those rights was a contempt and a breach of privilege." But, instead of that, the Convocation sent them a letter, wherein they justified their memorial, "as no ways inroaching upon the privileges of the House of Commons, and consequently no breach of privilege." Hereupon the Commons voted, "That all matters relating to the memorial should be razed out of the journals and books of Convocation." Which being like to raise greater heats, the Duke of Ormond thought proper to send a message to both Houses, that they should adjourn to the 1st of May ensuing; which was done accordingly.

During this adjournment, the Duke made a progress into the North of Ireland; and, having taken some able Engineers along with him, caused plans and schemes to be made, to increase the strength of several fortified towns. He was received every where with great respect; and the Presbyterians, who had been misrepresented, upon account of some late transactions in Scotland, thought this a proper opportunity to clear themselves of the aspersions cast upon them; and therefore, while the Duke was at Antrim and Londonderry, some of the Presbyterian Ministers waited on him, and delivered to him very dutiful addresses. But that did not hinder the Convocation from inveighing against them, in a Resolution passed by them soon after.

Upon the Duke's return to Dublin, the Parliament sat again; and the House of Commons, taking notice of the restless endeavours of the enemies of the public peace, to create divisions among the Protestants of that Kingdom, to strengthen the interest of the pretended Prince of Wales, and obstruct the Succession in the Protestant line, came to the following unanimous resolutions: May 25.

"I. That endeavouring to create or promote misunderstanding betwixt the Protestants of this Kingdom, tends to the advantage of the Papists, and the weakening the Protestant interest, is seditious, and of dangerous consequence to her Majesty's Government, and the Succession in the Protestant line as by law established.

"II. That by writing or dispersing pamphlets, or otherwise to insinuate danger to the Established Church from the Succession as by law established, tends to promote Popery, and the interest of the pretended Prince of Wales.

"III. That it is the indispensable duty of all Magistrates in this Kingdom to put the laws strictly in execution, against all persons who shall be guilty of such pernicious practices. (1)" These vigorous resolutions were chiefly owing to Mr. Molesworth.

On

(1) On the 1st of June, the Attorney-General reported, from the Committee appointed to consider the state of the Nation, the following Resolutions, which were also unanimously agreed to by the House: "I. That to suggest by words or writings, that the Established Church is not well-affected to the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, as settled by acts of Parliament, or any way inclined to "countenance Popery, is a false and malicious aspersion, and tends to create a dangerous division amongst Protestants, and to promote the designs of Papists and Traytors in favour of the pretended Prince of Wales. II. That the erecting and continuing any Seminary for the instruction and education of youth in principles contrary to the Established Church and Government, tends to create "and

On the other hand, the Convocation of the Clergy, to clear themselves from the aspersions of being enemies to the Protestant Succession, passed the following resolutions: "1. That this Church and Nation, having lately been in the utmost danger of being over-run by Popery and Tyranny, were happily delivered from both, by means of the late Revolution, brought about (under God's Providence) by his late Majesty King William III of glorious Memory. 2. That the continuance and improvement of these blessings are due (next under God) to the auspicious Reign and happy Government of her Majesty Queen Anne, whom Almighty God long preserve. 3. That the future security and preservation of this Church and Nation depends wholly (under God) on the Succession of the Crown, as it is now settled by law, in the Protestant line. 4. That if any Clergyman of this Church shall either by word or writing declare any thing in opposition to the foregoing resolutions (which we hope will never happen) we shall look upon him as a fower of divisions among the Protestants of the Established Church, and as an enemy to our Constitution. And, after this public and solemn declaration, we hope no person whatsoever will be so unjust and uncharitable, as to declare and insinuate, that the Clergy of the Church of Ireland, as by Law established, were not intirely in their affections for the late King William of glorious Memory, or are not in the true interest of the present Government; or that they are any way disaffected to the Succession in the Protestant line, as by law established." But to these four resolutions the Convocation added a fifth, levelled against the Presbyterians: "That for any person to teach or preach against the Doctrine, Government, Rites, or Ceremonies of this Church; or to keep up and maintain Schools and Seminaries for the education of youth, in principles contrary to those of the Established Church, is a contempt of the Ecclesiastical laws of this Kingdom, is of pernicious consequence, and serves only to continue and widen the unhappy schisms and divisions in the Nation."

June 16.

Soon after these resolutions and Votes, the Parliament was prorogued to the 13th of June 1706, and the Duke of Ormond embarked for England, leaving the Administration of the Government of Ireland in the hands of Sir Richard Cax, Lord-Chancellor, and of the Lord Cutts, Commander in chief of the Queen's forces, who were appointed Lords Justices during the Duke's absence.

Hist. of Eur.

A great change was now made in the Ministry of Scotland. The English Ministry, having with difficulty escaped being attacked upon account of the act of Security passed there, resolved to use their utmost endeavours to get the Protestant Succession settled there, or to procure an Union of the two Kingdoms. The Dukes of Argyle and Queensberry took this opportunity to serve each other; and severally to represent to the Whig Lords, "That the Marquis of Tweeddale and his party had been zealous promoters of the act of Security : That they were so insignificant and so despised through the whole Nation, that they could do nothing; but, granting they should prevail, and carry the Succession with the limitations insisted on, of what dangerous consequence must even that prove, since thereby a great part of the chief means England had to continue Scotland in dependance was removed, perhaps never to be recovered? That the Duke of Queensberry had been laid aside for no crime, and no reason given, but what testified his firmness and resolution in opposing every thing, that was disagreeable and inconvenient to England. And that the Duke of Argyle, being a young man, of a forward bold spirit, and lively natural parts, who had gained the leading of the Presbyterians, as his father had done before him, was therefore a proper person to be employed at this juncture." These, and the like considerations, had the desired effect with the Whig Lords, who prevailed with the Queen and her Ministers to lay aside the Motley Ministry of Scotland; and, accordingly, the Marquis of Tweeddale, the Earls of Rothes, Roxburg, and Selkirk, the Lords Belhaven, Mr. Bailie of Jerviswood, and Mr. Johnston were removed; and the chief management of affairs was committed to the Duke of Queensberry, though with the bare title of Lord Privy-Seal. At the same time the Duke of Argyle was declared High-Commissioner to the next Parliament; the Earl of Seafield reinstated Chancellor; the Marquis of Annandale and the Earl of Loudon made Secretaries of State; Sir James Murray of Philiphaugh Register; and all the Privy-Councillors laid aside by the last Ministry (except Sir James Fowles of Colington, and Mr. Lockhart of Cornwarth) were reformed.

The Duke of Argyle's Instructions were, that he should endeavour to procure an act, settling the Succession as it was in England; or to set on foot a treaty for the Union of the two Kingdoms. When he came to Scotland, and laid his instructions before the rest of the Ministers there, the Marquis of Annandale pressed, that they should first try that, which was first named in the instructions; and he seemed confident, that, if all, who were in employments, would concur in it, they should be able to carry it. Those of another mind, who were in their Hearts for the pretended Prince of Wales, put this by with great zeal, alledging, they must not begin with that, which would meet with great opposition, and be perhaps rejected: Opposition would beget such an Union of parties, that, if they miscarried in the one, they should not be able

"and perpetuate misunderstandings among Protestants. III. That saying mass, preaching or teaching in separate Congregations by persons, who have not taken the oath of abjuration, and hearing, maintaining, and countenancing such persons, tends to defeat the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, and to encourage and advance the interest of the pretended Prince of Wales. IV. That all No. 44. VOL. III.

"Judges and Magistrates are under the highest obligation to make the most diligent inquiry into all such wicked practices; and, to their utmost, endeavour to discover and punish the authors of them; and such, as wilfully neglect the same, ought to be looked upon as enemies to her Majesty's Government and the prosperity of this Kingdom."

able to carry the other; therefore they thought, that the first proposition should be for the Union: Not only as it was a popular thing, but as it seemed to be remote: And consequently, there would be a great opposition made to a general act about it. Those who intended still to oppose it, would reckon they should find matter enough in the particulars to raise a great opposition, and to defeat it. This court was agreed on; at which the Marquis of Annandale was so highly offended, that he concurred no more in the counsels of those, who gave the other advice. Some sincerely desired the Union, as that which would render the whole Island happy. Others were in their hearts against it: They thought it was a plausible step, which they believed would run by a long treaty into a course of some years: That, during that time, they should be continued in their employments; and they seemed to think, it was impossible to adjust all matters, as to frame such a treaty, as would pass in the Parliaments of both Kingdoms. The Jacobites concurred all heartily in this. It kept the settling the Succession at a distance, and very few looked on the motion for the Union as any thing but a pretence, to keep matters yet longer in suspense.

At the opening of the Session of Parliament, which met on the 28 of June 1705, there appeared three different parties; the Cavaliers, or Anti-Revolutioners; the Squadrons, or Flying Squadrons, consisting of discarded Courtiers, who pretended to hold and turn the balance of the contending parties (1); and the present Courtiers, who consisted of zealous Presbyterians and Revolutioners. The Cavaliers, headed by the Duke of Hamilton, applied to the Marquis of Tweeddale and his party, the flying squadron, to persuade them to unite again, to oppose the Courtiers; but they positively refused to treat or concert measures with the Cavaliers, resenting the disappointments they had met with the last year.

Many Members being absent at the opening of the Session, the Lord-Commissioner adjourned the Parliament to the 3d of July, when being met again, the Queen's letter to them was read, wherein her Majesty "recommended to them with the greatest earnestness, the settling the Succession in the Protestant line; and, to prevent any objection to the settlement, that could be suggested from the views or fear of future inconveniencies, that might happen to Scotland from thence, she told them, she should be ready to give the Royal assent to such provisions and restrictions, as should be found necessary and reasonable in such a case. That being fully satisfied, that great benefits would arise to all her subjects by an union of Scotland and England; and that nothing could contribute more to the composing of differences, and extinguishing the heats raised and fomented by the enemies of both Nations, than the promoting of every thing, that tended to the procuring the same: Therefore she earnestly recommended to them to pass an act for a Commission, to set a treaty on foot be-between the two Kingdoms, as her Parliament of England had done. Concluding with the usual demand of the necessary Supplies, and acquainting them with her choice of the Duke of Argyle to be her commissioner, whom she had fully empowered to declare her firm resolution to maintain the Government both in Church and State, as by law established, and to consent to such further laws, as should be thought necessary for that end, for the better improving of trade and manufactures, and generally for the good and advantage of the Kingdom." The Lord Commissioner, and the Earl of Seafeld, Lord Chancellor, in their respective speeches, inferred the necessity of what was recommended in the Queen's letter; and the same day was read another letter from the Queen to the Lord-Commissioner, appointing Lord Archibald Campbell, his first cousin, to have the place and voice of Lord High-Treasurer, in this Session of Parliament.

On the 6th of July, the Marquis of Annandale presented a proposal, "That the Parliament would go upon the consideration of such limitations and conditions of Government, as should be judged proper for the next Successor in the Protestant line; and that, at the same time, a Committee be appointed to consider the condition of the coin of the Nation, and the state of its commerce or trade, as to export and import, and to prepare and bring in the most proper remedies and regulations for that end." Hereupon the Earl Maribial presented a resolve, "That the House, previous to all other affairs, would make such regulations of the trade and coin of this Kingdom, as might be most for the Advantage of the Nation." Another resolve was also presented by the Earl of Mar, "That the House would, preferably to all other business, take into their consideration the Nation's circumstances, as to England, and how to enter into a treaty with them."

This last being seconded by few, his Lordship thought fit to withdraw it till another time; but the House fell into a debate of six hours upon the two first motions, and at last it came to the question, whether to proceed first to the consideration of coin and trade, or that of limitations; and the first was carried. Then a second question was put, Whether the coin and trade should be taken into consideration by way of resolve, which excluded all other business till that should be determined, or by way of proposal, which admitted of other business; and this was carried likewise by a great majority. It was the opinion of many, that the Cavaliers made a wrong step in postponing the more material affairs, and trifling away the beginning of the Session in matters of no importance; for, if they had immediately called for the Queen's letter, in order to return an answer to it, the treaty with England would naturally have fallen under consideration, and the Duke of Queensberry's friends not being yet gone off from them, they might have either rejected it, or at least clogged it as they pleased, and chosen such Mem-

Whatever ground there may have been for this conjecture, it is certain, that the three next * and many other federunts or fittings were spent in the consideration of trade; in relation to which several overtures or proposals were laid before the House, some of which passed into laws, and the others were rejected. Amongst the rest there were two proposals made for supplying the Nation with money by a Paper-credit. The first was offered by Dr. Hugh Chamberlane, whose project by a land-bank had, some years before, miscarried in England, and reduced him so low, that he was obliged to fly from his creditors into Scotland. The other was proposed by John Law, the son of a Goldsmith in Edinburgh, a man of subtle parts, who, having squandered away his small fortune, was forced to live by gaming, but who, being an agreeable debauchee, found the way to ingratiate himself with the Duke of Argyle, and the leaders of the flying Squadron. Upon the confidence of their support, he presented a very plausible scheme, which was readily espoused by all the Courtiers, and many of the flying Squadron, because it was so framed, that, in process of time, it would have brought all the estates of the Kingdom to depend upon the Government. But the House rejected the proposal, and came to a resolution,

* July 10,
12, 13.

“ That the establishing any kind of Paper-credit, so as to make bills pass for current coin, was an improper expedient.” A Council was likewise appointed, with power to put the laws relating thereto into execution; and it was recommended to them to bring the export and import of the Nation to a balance, and lay the same before the House next Session.

Before this act was brought to perfection, the Cavaliers made all possible efforts to prevent the settling of the succession, for which purpose the Duke of Hamilton, on the 17th. of July, presented the following resolve, “ That this Parliament will not proceed to the nomination of a Successor, till they have had a previous treaty with England in relation to commerce, and other concerns with that Nation.” And further, “ That this Parliament will proceed to make such limitations and conditions of Government for the rectification of the Constitution, as may secure the Liberty, Religion, and Independency of this Kingdom, before they proceed to the nomination of a Successor.” The Court, and most of the flying Squadron, united against this resolve; but the Cavaliers insisted vigorously upon it, and, by the assistance of some of the Duke of Queenberry's friends, carried it by a great majority. Upon this occasion the Lord Belhaven made a long speech (1), which had

(1) The Speech was as follows:

My Lord Chancellor,

“ By what experience I have had in this world, I always found, that when divisions are once come to that confusivity, as to form themselves in factions upon different measures and opposite designs, that then reason and reasoning make but a very small impression upon either of the parties. Therefore I shall not enter into the merits of this Resolve, nor of its expediency or unexpediency at this time, that I may not give the least rise to debate, or occasion of misunderstanding amongst ourselves. What I shall say on this head, is to advance this position, viz. That there is more danger to our Nation, and National concerns by divisions and factions, than by any mistakes in fit and adequate measures, if they be unanimously gone upon.

“ A wrong measure, especially in resolutions, may be rectified and redressed, when we come to a fuller view of the affair. And, though sometimes they prove unsuccessful, yet unanimity endures a shock with firmness; but divisions and factions increase and multiply, and that from very small beginnings, so as to render all persuasions abortive; and that more especially amongst men of honour, who, as they are generally more grateful, constant, and firm to their words and parties, so upon disappointments they are more prone to resentment and revenge, the most dangerous of all passions, and the most fatal to the very being of Nations.

“ What I plead for, my Lord, at this time, is Unity. Would you have limitations? Go upon them unanimously. Would you have a treaty? Do the like. Would you settle the Succession upon limitations without a treaty? Would you settle the Succession on treaty without limitations? Would you have neither done at this time? In short, whatever you would have done, let it be done nemine contradicente, and it will not want its own weight; for I am persuaded, that, whatever resolution this honourable House shall come to, a wrong measure is preferable to a good one, if there

“ My Lords, I could bring in instances from the Histories of Europe, to confirm what I have said, and from none more than that of our neighbours, the States of Holland, whose Unity has raised them to the grandeur and riches they are possessed of at this day. They wanted not wrong measures and unsuccessful attempts; but their unanimous firmness in the vindication of their liberty hath made good the verity of their Motto, Concordiæ Res parvæ crescent.

“ But, waving what is foreign, I shall confine myself to our own Histories, and by four examples I shall make it evidently appear, that our Predecessors, when in good understanding amongst themselves, were always in a condition to defend their rights and liberties against the English, and that they never did prevail over us, save when we were divided and broke by factions.

“ The first instance is of that famous controversy about the right of Succession of Alexander the Third. The story is so well known, that I shall not give this Honourable House the trouble of hearing it repeated, but shall only say, we divided upon it. What followed upon that? The King of England gave us a King. What was the consequence of that? Both of us paid very dear for it. For, as the Historians of both Nations tell us, there followed upon it the longest and most bloody war, that ever was betwixt two Nations. Then, and not before, could it be said, that England had any pretence of homage from us.

“ Pray, my Lord, had it not been better, that our Predecessors had of themselves chosen the worst of competitors, yea the worst men of the Nation by a general consent, rather than to have sustained those calamities, which followed on that division?

“ The other time, my Lord, that we groaned under English bondage, was by Cromwell, who knew as well how to divide, as how to fight. We had called home King Charles the Second, as Successor to his Father. Cromwell enters Scotland with an army, and prevails. What was the reason of it? Was his army comparable to ours in number? He knew very well King Charles the First, his Master,

“ had

1705. had such an effect, that, after some debate, the Duke of Hamilton's resolve was approved. On the 20th of July, the Parliament met again, and read the draught of a letter presented by the Marquis of Tweeddale, in answer to her Majesty's letter to the Parliament; as also a draught of an act for a treaty with England, presented by the Earl of Mar; another draught of an act for a treaty with England presented by the Marquis of Lolbrian; a draught of an act concerning the way of chusing Officers of State, Privy-Counsellors, and Members of the Exchequer and Treasury, in case of her Majesty's decease, without heirs of her body to succeed, presented by the Earl of Rothes; and some other draughts of acts relating to trade: All which were ordered to be printed.

On the 23d of July, the Duke of Queenberry arrived at Edinburgh, where he made a public entry with greater splendor and magnificence, and was received with greater demonstrations of joy, than the three times he had been Commissioner. The next day he went to Parliament, where the draught of a letter, in answer to the Queen's, was read, intimating "the Parliament's readiness to establish the same Successor with England; begging her Majesty would grant them such limitations to her Successors, as were necessary for that purpose;

"and assuring her, that, if this was once done, they would cheerfully set about the work." But, a motion being made, that, preferably to that letter, the House should take into consideration acts relating to trade, the same was agreed to.

This being over, the Cavaliers inclined to proceed upon the limitations, proposing thereby, in the first place, to obstruct the Establishment of the succession, in case the projected treaty should fail; for they knew the Court would not grant them the Royal assent, and that the Succession would then miscarry. In the next place, to lay all the restraints possible on the Monarch, in case the House of Hanover should come to the Crown. And lastly, to ingratiate themselves with the people, who thought themselves oppressed by England, and were extremely fond of every thing, that seemed to free them from it. A motion being made on the 31st of July, to grant the first reading to an act of Commission for a treaty with England, the Duke of Hamilton, in opposition thereto, moved, that the House would proceed to the enacting the limitations; and, a vote being stated in these terms, Proceed to consider the act for a treaty, or limitations, the latter was carried. In the next sedesunt, on the 2d of August, several acts for that purpose were presented; the most considerable of which was,

"had come upon us with a far better army, and we less prepared, and less accustomed to war; and yet, though sword in hand, he was necessitated to give us a valuable treaty at the Birks. He knew very well, that we had the remains of that gallant army, which had procured us so good conditions at the treaty of Rippon, and who afterwards had raised the Parliamentary power above that of their Sovereign. He knew, that we had the brave troops, that had preserved the North of Ireland from the Irish rebels. Whence then came all those hopes of Olivier? It came, my Lords, from our divisions: We were united in those former times, and broken then. In short, we had the Hamiltons, Grahams, and Campbells, each driving on opposite designs. Nay, my Lord, faction was come to that height of Enthusiasm, that, when we came to fight Cromwell at Dunbar, we would not fight but as Gideon did the Midianites, although we had no such warrant for it. I pray God, my Lord, things come not to such an height now, especially when we, as they, mind more, who shall do such and such things, than what things are fittest to be done; so that every Commissioner now must have the board swept clean, before he undertakes the Queen's business. I speak not this, my Lord, out of any resentment I have, by being lately turned out of a post, I profess I have not the least resentment upon it. Why should not the Queen employ what servants she thinks fit? But I speak of it, because I am afraid it proves a seed to faction, it having proved so prolific already, as to have two crops in one year, though in this Northern climate.

"The two instances, where our Unity preserved us from the fatal consequences of war with England, are those of King David and King James the First, after we had recovered under the conduct of the noble Bruce, who had forced the Grand-child, by a most solemn renunciation, to yield up the claim of homage, unjustly imposed by the Father upon us. Two unhappy accidents put these two Kings in the hands of the English. Did they let go the opportunities to trump up their claim of homage? No, my Lord. What hindered them to proceed further? King David had lost a considerable battle, was there made prisoner himself, many of the Nobility killed and taken, England successful against France

"at the same time, and their King prisoner in England. King James the First was their prisoner, being forced to fly from the unjust designs of his uncle Robert, and as unjustly made prisoner by them. These occasions, my Lord, did appear favourable enough for England to make use of; but our firm unanimity put a stop to their designs. We declared we would not obey our Kings as long as they were under English power and influence; and so both our armies in France, and Peers in Scotland, refused their oaths, as long as they were in England, looking upon them not as their King's commands, but the commands of an Enemy. And thus we were preserved, and our Kings delivered to us upon ransom.

"My Lord, I have observed, that England never let go any opportunity, neither before nor since the Union of the two Crowns, to bring us under their power; and I am persuaded, that the heats and animosities amongst us these several Sessions of Parliament have, amongst other things, occasioned that threatening and unaccountable act of Parliament, wherein they characterize our Ministers, and criticize our acts; as it hath also given birth to those contemptible and ignorant pamphlets, published of late against the Sovereignty and Independency of our Nation. Will you prevent the consequences of what is designed against us? Be as united as they in your actions against them. Did Whig and Tory differ about us? No, my Lord: The two Houses, though in civil war among themselves, did vie with one another, which of them should have the honour to give us the sharpest and severest blow.

"To conclude, Would you quench the fire, that appears to be raised against us in England? Would you have a successful treaty and good limitations? Be unanimous; and, I hope, the case is not as yet so desperate, but what our Predecessors have found, we may yet find the like.

"It may be asked, my Lord, How shall we be unanimous, and who shall yield? I think providence has made that very easy with relation to this resolve. For suppose some be for limitations, that are not for a treaty; and others for a treaty, that are not for limitations; and that those, who are against a treaty, are against it, because they do not expect reasonable and good conditions from England; and

"that

1705. was, An act for regulating the chusing the Officers of State, enacting, "That from and after her Majesty's decease, without heirs of her body, all Officers of State, and Privy-Counsellors, and Lords of Session, should be chosen and appointed by the Parliament; and in case of the decease of any of them, during the vacancy of Parliament, the office to be supplied by one nominated by the Council, who should continue in the same till next Session of Parliament: And that all the Officers of State and Privy-Counsellors should be accountable to the Parliament." The Court offered, on the 16th of August, a clause, giving the power of chusing Officers of State (which by this act was solely lodged in Parliament) to the King, with consent of Parliament, which was carried in the negative; as was also a motion, that there should be three Presidents of the Session, to preside by turns each two months. On the 22d, the whole act was approved, and, the next day, an act for a Triennial Parliament was read in these terms: "Our Sovereign Lady, being willing to restore to her ancient Kingdom their ancient custom and right to frequency of Parliaments, does therefore, with the advice and consent of Parliament, statute and ordain, That there shall be a new Parliament called and indited, to meet, sit, and act; and that once every third year after the 1st of August in the year. And her Majesty does hereby declare, with consent aforesaid, that this present Parliament shall not continue and endure any longer than the 1st of August aforesaid; and this, without prejudice of her Majesty and Successors Royal prerogative and power to dissolve Parliaments sooner than the said term of three years, as shall be thought fit. And further, with the advice aforesaid, statutes and ordains, that, from and after the 1st day of August aforesaid, no Farmer or Collector of her Majesty's customs or excise, or any other branch of her Majesty's revenue, shall be capable to be a Member of Parliament, nor to sit and vote therein after the date aforesaid; and it "shall be a sufficient objection against any Member, that he is concerned, directly or indirectly, as a Farmer or Collector, in any part of her Majesty's revenue, to remove him from his place and vote in Parliament." The Courtiers saw it was to no purpose to oppose this act; and, being afraid of a new Parliament, they only proposed, that this act should not take place during her Majesty's life. The Cavaliers, on the other hand, insisted, that it should commence immediately; but many Members, who doubted their own interest to be elected anew, proposed a medium betwixt the two, that it should take place three years after the date, that is, the 1st of August 1708; with which, as the least of the two evils, the Courtiers joined and carried it, and so the whole act was approved. Another act ordaining, that the Scots Ambassadors, representing Scotland, should be present, when the Sovereign had occasion to treat with foreign Princes and States, and accountable to the Parliament of Scotland, was also approved: But several other overtures were made, that never were ingrossed into acts. Nor did the abovementioned act obtain the Royal assent, though the Court promised it often to many of the Members, and thereby kept them in good humour, while the act for a treaty was framing, they thinking themselves in a tolerable good state by those acts of limitation, and never imagining, that the treaty would terminate as it did. But Fletcher of Salton, having, in a long discourse, set forth the deplorable state, to which the Scots Nation was reduced by being subjected to English counsels and measures, while the same person was King of both Kingdoms, concluded, that those acts were not sufficient, and therefore presented a scheme of limitations, which he proposed to be ingrossed into an act, and taken into consideration; "I. That elections should be made at every Michaelmas Head-Court for a new Parliament every year, to sit the 1st of November next following, and adjourn themselves from time to time till next Michaelmas. That they chuse their own President, and that every thing be determin-

"ned

"that those, who are against limitations, are against them, because they would prove of no long continuance, and consequently look upon them only as an amusement to bring us to the English Succession: There is no reason, my Lord, in all this, why both parties should not agree in the resolve. For, suppose all those suppositions should prove true, shall we then be in any worse condition than we are at present? Shall it be said, we will not so much as resolve to treat with England; or that limitations, which are in our power, both to make and to keep, shall be looked upon by us as things impracticable, and of no duration? No, my Lord, we have a gracious Queen, that will assist us in both, and who, in her gracious letter, seems to desire both.

"I do consider England, with relation to the Succession of Britain, as so many fishes inclosed in a large strong net. They have room to swim, to fly, and tumble; but, as long as the fisherman keeps his hold, they cannot break through. I believe by this time they are sensible, that the Succession to the two Kingdoms in Britain ought not to have been designed, much less settled, without acquainting one part of Britain with the design, and that one part independent upon the other. Therefore if we be united, and keep our hold, and make no unreasonable demand, either of limitations from our Queen,

Numb. XLV. Vol. III.

"or conditions from England, but merely such as the necessity of the Nation requires; I hope, by the blessing of God upon our just endeavours, and the cordial support of our excellent Sovereign, that we shall have all our desires granted, and a good understanding betwixt the two Nations promoted, not for this time only, but for ever: Which, if they do slight at this time, I dare pretend to prophecy, that the time will come, when they will give with less ceremony.

"Thus, my Lord, I have frankly told you my mind, and that with all deference and submission to this honourable House; and though I do not pretend to the thanks of this Parliament, as the Lord Howersham had of the House of Lords, yet I will not yield to his Lordship, as to my integrity and sincere concern for the Commonwealth of Britain. And in one thing, I think, I have the advantage, that what I have said tends to the composing of differences; first, amongst ourselves, and then betwixt our neighbouring Nations and us. Whereas his Lordship's speech, if I be not as much mistaken, as his Lordship was at the time he spoke it, tends directly the quite contrary way. Therefore I am for the resolve, and for the beginning with the limitations."

1705. "ned by balloting in place of voting. II. "That so many lesser Barons should be added "to the Parliament, as there had been Noble- "men created since the last augmentation of "the number of Barons : And that in all time "coming, for every Nobleman, that should be "created, there should be a Baron added to the "Parliament. III. That no man should have "a vote in Parliament, but a Nobleman, or "elected Member. IV. That the King should "give the Royal assent to all the laws offered "by the Estates ; and that the President of the "Parliament be empowered by his Majesty to "give the Royal assent in his absence, and have "ten pounds Sterling a day salary. V. That "a Committee of thirty-one Members, of "which nine be a Quorum, chosen out of their "number by every Parliament under the King, "should have the administration of the Go- "vernment, be his Council, and accountable to "the Parliament, with power, on extraordina- "ry occasions, to call the Parliament together : "And that, in the said Council, all things be "determined by balloting, instead of voting. "VI. That the King, without consent of the "Parliament, should not have the power of "making peace and war, or of concluding any "treaty with any other State or Potentate. "VII. That all places and offices, both civil "and military, and all pensions formerly con- "ferred by the Crown, should ever after be gi- "ven by Parliament. VIII. That no regiment "or company of horse, foot, or dragoons, be "kept on foot in peace or war, but by consent "of Parliament. IX. That all the fencible "men in the Nation, betwixt sixty and sixteen, "be armed with bayonets and firelocks, all of "a caliver ; and continue always provided in "such arms and ammunition suitable. X. That "no general indemnity, or pardon for any tran- "sgression, should be valid, without consent of "Parliament. XI. That the fifteen Senators "of the College of Justice should be incapable "of being Members of Parliament, or of any "other office or pension, but the salary, that "belongs to their place, to be increased as the "Parliament should think fit. That the office "of President should be in three of their num- "ber, to be named by the Parliament, and that "there be no extraordinary Lords : As also, "that the Lords of the Justice-Court should be "distinct from those of the Session, and under "the same restrictions. XII. That, if any "King should break in upon any of these con- "ditions of Government, he should, by the "Estates, be declared to have forfeited the "Crown." Fletcher enlarged upon every arti- "cle, endeavouring to shew, that the first eight "were necessary to prevent English influence over "Scots affairs ; the ninth, to inable the Nation to "defend its rights and liberties ; and the tenth, "to deter Ministers of State from presuming to "give the King bad advice, and doing things "contrary to law (1). The eleventh article he said "was necessary to preserve the Judicatories from "corrupt Judges : "And if the twelfth, conclu"ded he, be not approved, sure, I am, this 1705. "House must own, the last King James was "barbarously and unjustly treated." However "this scheme of limitations was never framed into "an act.

Another material point, under the considera- "tion of this Parliament, was the Plot. They "had, in the former Session, addressed the Queen "to transmit to them such persons, as were evi- "dences in, and such papers as related to, that af- "fair ; and, in the beginning of this Session, the "Dukes of Hamilton and Arbol were very desirous "to prosecute it to the utmost. But the Cava- "liers were not so forward ; first, because they "were under a kind of engagement to the Earl "of Mar and Sir James Murray of Philipsburgh, "that, if the Duke of Queensberry's friends opposed "the Marquis of Tweeddale and his party, as in "the former Session, they should not insist on "that affair ; which would irritate the Duke's "friends to such a degree, that many of them "would not concur in opposing the act for a trea- "ty. In the next place, the Cavaliers considered, "that the edge of many people's indignation a- "gainst the Plot was blunted, by its lying so long "dormant. And being, at the same time, apprehen- "sive of being baffled, if they attempted any "thing against the Duke of Queensberry, they re- "solved to stand neuter, at least till they saw, "whether the Dukes of Hamilton and Arbol could "prove any thing. It being moved, on the 28th "of August, that the House might be acquainted "what answer the Queen had returned to the "address, the Lord-Commissioner declared, That "he had received a letter from her Majesty re- "lating to that matter, and would signify her "pleasure therein to the Parliament in a few days. "Accordingly, on the 11th of September, the "Lord-Chancellor acquainted the House, that the "rest of the papers relating to the late plot were "now transmitted ; and that they should be given "to the Clerk Register, to be perused by the "Members of the House. But, when the House "took these papers into consideration, it was "urged, that they were only copies, and that the "principal evidences, such as Sir John Maclean, "Mr. Keith, and others remained in London ; and "that the Parliament could not proceed any fur- "ther in that affair, unless the original papers, and "the persons, who were evidences, were at their "command. However, the Dukes of Hamilton "and Arbol, and Baillie of Jerviswood, made "speeches in their own vindication, asserting, that "the accusation against them in the discovery of "the pretended plot was false and calumnious. The "Duke of Arbol, in particular, made a long nar- "rative of the beginning, progress, and conclu- "sion of the whole affair ; accused the Duke of "Queensberry of endeavouring to give the Queen "sinister impressions of her good subjects ; pro- "duced copies of letters sent from him to her Ma- "jesty, affirming, that all the Cavaliers had an "hand in the plot, or, at least, were enemies to "her ; and that, the better to carry on his design, "he had employed and held correspondence with "Frazier or Lord Levat. But, notwithstanding all "this

(1) The Earl of Stair having spoken against this "scheme, Fletcher, in answer, said, "It was no won- "der his Lordship was against it ; for, had there "been such an act, his Lordship had been long before

"hanged for the advices he gave King James, the "murder of Glenca, and his conduct since the Revo- "lution." See Vol. I.

1705. this great clamour, no further notice was taken of this affair.

The business, which the Court had principally at heart, was the act for a treaty with England. The Earl of Mar had, in the beginning of this Session, presented an act for appointing Commissioners to treat with Commissioners from England of an Union; which lay upon the table, till most of the overtures in relation to trade and the limitations were discussed; but, these being over, the other was reassumed. This act was much of the same nature and import with the act passed in England, both empowering Commissioners to meet and treat of an Union of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, and restraining them from treating of any alterations of the Church-Government, as by law established, in the respective Realms. The only material difference was, that the English act not only gave the Queen the nomination of the Commissioners on the part of England, but required also, that the Queen should name and appoint the Scots Commissioners; whereas, in the draught presented by the Earl of Mar, there was a blank for the power of the nomination. This gave occasion to Fletcher of Salton, in a pathetic speech, on the 28th of August, to inveigh against the haughty and imperious proceedings of the English in this affair; exhorting the House to resent this treatment, as became Scotsmen, for which purpose he offered an address to be presented to her Majesty, importing, "That the act passed in the Parliament of England, containing a proposal for a treaty of Union of the two Kingdoms, was made in such injurious terms to the honour and interest of the Scots Nation, that they, who represented that Kingdom in Parliament, could no ways comply with it; which they had the greater regret to refuse, because a treaty of Union had, in this Session, been recommended to them by her Majesty. But that they should be always ready to comply with any such proposal from the Parliament of England, whenever it should be made in terms no ways dishonourable or disadvantageous to the Scots Nation." The House, rejecting this motion, called for the Earl of Mar's draught, and for the English act, both which were read. The Cavaliers and Country-party observing, that there was a great inclination in the House to set a treaty on foot, thought it improper to oppose it any longer in general terms; and therefore resolved to endeavour to clog the Commission with such restrictions and provisions, as should retard the treaty's taking effect. In order thereto, the Duke of Hamilton presented a clause to be added to the act, importing, "That the Union to be treated on should no ways derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights, liberties, and dignities of the Scots Nation." This the Courtiers vigorously opposed, as inconsistent with the intended intire or incorporating Union, of which the abolishing the Scots Parliament was a necessary consequence. And thereupon they urged, "That, since Scotland and England were under one Sovereign, who mediated between her two Kingdoms, and England had already given ample powers to their Commissioners, it would be unbecoming in Scotland to restrain their Commissioners. That it would shew a jealousy of her Majesty; and, might put a stop to the treaty, since England could not but expect, that the Scots Commissioners should have as ample powers as theirs. That there could be no danger in giving unlimited powers to their Commissioners, since it was expressly provided, that no matter or thing treated of, and agreed to, should be of any force, unless it were first approved of and ratified by the Parliaments of both Kingdoms. And therefore, when their Commissioners should make their report of the scheme of Union, that should be agreed on, then it would be proper for the House to consider, whether they would ratify or reject the same." To this it was answered, "That Scotland and England's being under one Sovereign made this clause necessary, since woful experience taught them, and it had been often complained of in the House, that their Sovereign was under English influence, and subject to the counsels of her English Ministers, who regarded the interest and honour of Scotland no farther, than was consistent with that of England. That the adding of this clause could never imply the least mistrust of the Queen's inclinations towards her ancient Kingdom, since all that could be made of it was, that the Scots Parliament being sensible, that the Queen was not in a capacity to know the interest and circumstances of Scotland so well as those of England, had taken care to prevent any inconveniencies, that might arise from thence. That there were some things so sacred, that the least innovation or alteration, much less the abrogating or suspending them, was never to be attempted, or the subject of any treaty. And the particulars of this clause, such as the Sovereignty, Independency, and Freedom of the Nation, being of this nature, ought therefore to be added. That England could not take it amiss, since they themselves had refrained their own Commissioners from treating of any alteration in the Church-Government of that Kingdom. That the Scots were a free independent people, and had a power to give what instructions, powers, and restrictions they pleased to their Commissioners. Neither was it to be imagined, that England would refuse to treat upon account of this clause, because the very clause, in the same express words, was inserted in the act of the treaty in the Reign of King James VI. and to the same purpose in most of the subsequent acts of treaty; and yet neither that King (who would have had good reason to be offended at any disrespect or distrust shewn towards him) nor his Successors, nor the Parliament of England, made any scruple upon that account, to meet and treat with the Commissioners of Scotland." These and many other arguments were urged for and against the clause; but the question being put, Whether it should be added, or not? It was carried in the negative by two voices only, thro' the neglect of seven or eight of the Cavaliers and Country-party, who happened to be absent.

This being over, another clause was offered, importing, "That the Commissioners should not go out of Scotland, to enter into any treaty with those to be appointed for England, until there was an act passed by the Parliament of England, rescinding that clause in the English act, by which it was enacted, that

1705. "the subjects of Scotland should be adjudged "and taken as Aliens, after the 25th of December 1705." The Cavaliers insisted upon this clause as necessary to vindicate the honour of the Nation from the injustice of the English in that act, upon a belief, that, if it were added, the English would not comply with it, and so the treaty would come to nothing. Upon the same consideration the Courtiers opposed it; but, observing it took with the House, they did not presume to do it openly, but by this artful motion, "That the clause should be approved, though not, as was proposed, ingrossed with the body of the act for a treaty; but a resolve of the House passed, that, after the act were finished, the House would immediately proceed to consider, whether the clause should be of force by a particular act, or by an order of the House;" and the question being stated, "Add the clause to the act, or by a separate way," the latter was carried. By this the Courtiers were sure of having a treaty; for, if the clause was turned into an act at the close of the Session (when they had no more to require of the Parliament) they might grant the Royal assent to the act of treaty, or refuse it to this, as they should be directed from England: And in case the clause was turned into an order of the House, then they might dissolve the Parliament, by which means the act, empowering the Commissioners to treat, remained in force, and the order ceased. Before the vote was stated, upon the act for a treaty, the Duke of Arbol, on the 1st of September, entered his protest in these terms: "In regard, that by an English act of Parliament made in the last Session thereof, intituled, An Act for the effectual securing England from the dangers, that may arise from the several acts lately passed in Scotland, the subjects of this Kingdom are to be adjudged Aliens, born out of the allegiance of the Queen, as Queen of England, after the 25th of December, 1705; I do therefore protest for myself, and in the name and behalf of all such, as shall adhere to this my protestation, that, for saving the honour and interest of her Majesty, as Queen of this Kingdom, and maintaining and preserving the undoubted rights and privileges of her subjects, no act for a treaty with England ought to pass in this House, unless a clause be adjoined thereto, prohibiting and discharging the Commissioners, that may be nominated and appointed for carrying on the said treaty, to depart the Kingdom, in order thereto, until the said act be repealed and rescinded by the Parliament of England." To this protest most of the Cavaliers and Country party, and all the Squadrons adhered, making in all twenty-four Peers, thirty-seven Barons, and eighteen Boroughs. While the rolls were calling, upon this resolve (it being very late) many of the Members, after they had given their votes, went out of the House, expecting, that the Parliament would not have proceeded to any more business that night; but, immediately after the last name in the roll was called, Duke Hamilton, addressing himself to the Chancellor, moved, that the nomination of the Commissioners for the treaty should be left wholly to the Queen. Upon this unexpected motion fourteen or fifteen of the Cavaliers ran out of the House in rage and despair, saying aloud, "That it was to no purpose to stay any longer, since the Duke of Hamilton had deserted and so basely betrayed them." However those, who remained, strenuously opposed the motion; and a hot debate arose upon it, wherein the Cavaliers used the very arguments, which Duke Hamilton had often urged: "What! leave the nomination to the Queen? No; she is in a manner a prisoner in England; and the estates of Scotland had taught us our duty in a case nearly related to this, during the captivity of King James the First. Our Queen knows none of us, but as introduced by her English Ministry, and recommended by our inclinations to serve that Kingdom. Our Queen never had an opportunity to know the true interest of our Country; and, though she did, yet in her present circumstances, cannot shew her regard for it: And who then so proper to nominate Scots Commissioners to treat of Scots affairs as a Scots Parliament?" Little or nothing was offered in answer either to these arguments, or against the motion, "That no person, who had any estate in England, should be of the number of the Commissioners." Which was levelled at the Duke of Hamilton. But the Courtiers still insisting, that the sense of the House might be known in this matter, the question was put, "Whether the nomination of the Commissioners be left in the Queen, or to the Parliament?" And, by reason of the absence of the Members before-mentioned, it was carried for the Queen by a majority of eight voices only. Duke Hamilton's proceeding in this affair was highly resented by the Cavaliers; but he endeavoured to vindicate himself, by alledging, That after the Parliament had rejected the several clauses, that were proposed to be added to the act, he thought it in vain to contend any longer; and, since the Court would have had a majority, to give the nomination to the Queen, he might be allowed to make her the compliment. Besides, it was the Duke's opinion, that, if the Commissioners named by the Queen should do any thing, that should not be approved in the subsequent Parliament, they might be the more severely censured for it, than if the Parliament had named them. But it is thought, that the Duke had a mind to be one of the Commissioners himself; and fearing, that he should not be named by the Parliament, he resolved to rely upon the Duke of Argyle's and the Earl of Mar's promise of his being named by the Queen; who having refused to do so, the Duke of Argyle resented it so far, that he would not suffer himself to be named, and even threatened to oppose the Union, though means were afterwards found to induce him to alter his mind.

In the next sitting of the Parliament, on the 4th of September, two draughts of an address were presented, one by the Earl of Sutherland, the other by Fletcher of Salton, beseeching her Majesty to use her endeavours with the Parliament of England to rescind that part of the English act, declaring the subjects of Scotland to be Aliens; both which draughts were read, as was also the overture of an act, ordaining, that the Commissioners on the part of Scotland should not enter upon the treaty for an Union with England, until that clause were repealed. Hereupon the Courtiers moved, that the Parliament should proceed by way of order to their Com-

1705. Commissioners, and by address to her Majesty, and not by way of act; and, after some debate, the question being put, was carried for the order and address, which were immediately drawn up, and unanimously agreed to. Then an overture of an act was presented, discharging the Peers of Scotland from going into England, without leave of the Privy-Council; but, on the 6th of September, after a first reading of this overture, it was rejected. After this, the House considered the act for a treaty with England, and made some amendments to the clause containing the powers to be given to the Commissioners. The Cavaliers took this occasion to renew the motion, "That an Union should not derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights and dignities, and liberties of the Kingdom of Scotland;" but, after some debate, the question being put, Whether that clause should be added, it was carried in the negative, and then the act was approved, and received the Royal assent. However, the Duke of Athol protested against it, for the reasons contained in his former protest, and was adhered to by twenty Noblemen, thirty-three Barons, and eighteen Boroughs. Two days after, the act for granting the Queen a Supply of six months cess, amounting to four hundred and thirty-two thousand, eight hundred pounds (Scots money) for maintaining the army, garrisons, and frigates for one year, was approved. On the 18th of September, the House went upon the public accounts, and allowed to the Commissioners of the same two hundred pounds Sterling each; fifty pounds to the Clerk, and twenty pounds to other Servants; fifteen hundred pounds to the Lord Belhaven; three hundred pounds to the Duke of Queensberry, and three thousand pounds to the Duke of Argyll, as being due to him; which sums were paid out of the fifty thousand pounds Sterling granted to the Queen. After which, the Parliament was adjourned to the 20th of December following (1).

Not long after the adjournment, the Earl of Mar, who, during the whole Session, had done considerable service to the Court, was made Secretary of State in the room of the Marquis of Amundale, who was appointed Lord President of the Council in Scotland, and who was removed from the post of Secretary, because he was thought to hold a private correspondence with the Squadrons, being rather inclined to favour the Protestant Succession without, than with an Union; and therefore would not follow the Duke of Queensberry's dictates further than he pleased; upon which account, he was much caricatured by the Cavaliers.

Having thus given a full relation of the Parliamentary affairs of this year, it is now time to turn to the progress of the War.

The Duke of Marlborough, having delivered the Empire by the victory at Blenheim, had long considered how to improve that success; and having communicated his several projects to the Cabinet Council, none seemed so judiciously laid, as the making an impression upon the frontiers of France. The design therefore was, that the Moselle should be the scene of action; and care was taken to lay up magazines of all sorts in Friers for that purpose. To carry on this design, two things were absolutely necessary; first, the concurrence of the Dutch, who seemed unwilling to let their troops go so far from their frontiers, lest they should lose, in one campaign, the barrier, which they had been forming in two or three; and, secondly, the quickening the slowness of the Germans, without whose joint assistance, the Duke of Marlborough could not act there with probability of success. The States, however, consented, that he should carry the greatest part of their army to the Moselle, and resolved to lie on the defensive upon their own frontiers; for they reckoned, that, how strong soever the Elector of Bavaria's army was at that time, yet, when France should be pressed with so great a force, as they computed would be on the Moselle, he would be ordered to send such detachments thither, that his army would be soon diminished, and so would not have the superior strength long.

This being the Duke of Marlborough's scheme, he set out on the 26th of March 1705, from St. James's towards Harwich, where he embarked on the 30th, and landed in Holland on the 2d of April. Upon his arrival at the Hague, he had several Conferences with the Pensionary and other Members of the Assembly of the States-General, in which he laid before them the great advantages, which would arise to the whole Confederacy, from the vigorous prosecution of his design; which would deprive France of the means, either of enlarging her conquests in Piedmont, or of protecting Spain, by reducing her to the necessity of defending herself at home. The Duke had likewise another motive, which concurred to put him upon these measures. The Marshal de Villars, lately made a Duke of France, was the principal dependence of Lewis XIV: The Duke therefore judged, that to triumph over and ruin the reputation of the Marshal, by a single defeat, would be a service to the common cause preferable to all others. The consequence of such a defeat would have been the submission of the three Bishopricks; after which, nothing could have prevented his making himself master of Thionville, and even of Luxembourg itself.

The Dutch were soon made sensible of the reasonableness of the Duke's plan; but the difficulty was to bring Prince Lewis of Baden to concur

(1) On the 16th of August, it was moved and resolved, that Mr. James Anderson, Writer to her Majesty's signet, having written a Book intitled, An Historical Essay, shewing that the Crown and Kingdom of Scotland, are imperial and independent, have a reward of four thousand eight hundred pounds Scots money for that good service; and that the thanks of the Parliament be given him by the Lord Chancellor in presence of the Lord High Commissioner; which was done accordingly. It was also moved and resolved, that Mr. James Hodge, who in his No. 45. Vol. III.

Writings had served the interests of the Scots Nation, should have the like reward. But on the other hand, complaint being made of a Book intitled, The Superiority and direct Dominion of the Imperial Crown of England over the Kingdom of Scotland, and also of the Pamphlet, intitled, the Scots Patriot unmasthead, both written by Mr. William Atwood, as scurrilous, full of falsehoods, and reflecting upon the honour and independency of the Scots Nation; the same were ordered to be burnt by the hand of the Common Hangman.

concur in it. That Prince had seemed to approve of it so well, during the winter, that no doubt was then made of his being both able and willing to enter upon this new scene of the war. But, as the Duke of Mariborough was setting out, depending on his concurrence, he received an express from him, excusing himself, both from his own want of health, and because the force he had about him was not considerable, nor was that, which he expected, like to come to him so soon as might be wished for. This could not stop the Duke of Mariborough, who had set his heart upon opening the campaign in those parts, and had great hopes of success. He resolved therefore to push the affair as far as he could, and accordingly went to confer with the Prince at Rastadt, where he arrived on the 19th of May. The Prince's ill health seemed only a pretence. It was true, that the Princes and Circles of the Empire had not sent in their quota's; but it appeared, that there was already strength enough, in conjunction with the army, which the Duke of Mariborough was to bring, to advance, and open the campaign with great advantage, at least till detachments should come from others parts. The Prince of Baden at last consented to this, and promised to follow with all the forces he could bring.

expecting the Prince of Baden, who failed him. The Duke, being satisfied with these assurances, went from Rastadt, on the 22d of May, to view the lines of Biehl and Stolhoffen, from whence he proceeded to Manheim, and then to Triers, where he arrived on the 26th, and having assembled all the troops in the neighbourhood of that place, the English and Dutch forces, which were encamped near Jegel on the other side of the Moselle, passed that river, on the 3d of June, over several bridges, and from thence marched to those prepared for them over the Saar, which river they passed also at Consaarbruck. The Hessians, Danes, and Lunenburghers passed the Saar at the same time, and so all the forces joined. After a difficult march of near eight hours, they at last advanced within a quarter of a league of Sirk, near which place Marshal Villars was incamped with a numerous army. It being too late to incamp, the troops lay on their arms all that night. The next morning they incamped at Elft, the right being at Perle near Sirk on the Moselle, and the left at Hollondorp within sight of the enemy's army. Upon the appearance of the Allies the day before, the enemy immediately prepared for a retreat, which they now put in execution with great precipitation, and marched from Sirk towards Coningfmacheren, possessing themselves of a very advantageous camp, which they made yet stronger by casting up intrenchments, and felling trees; so that there was no possibility of attacking them in that post with the least probability of success. This indeed was no disappointment to the Duke, for he did not design to attack them; and his advancing so far was only to cover the intended siege of Saar-Louis. The taking of that place was of so great importance, that the success of the whole campaign on that side depended on it; and, time being very precious, the Duke dispatched frequent expresses to quicken the march, not only of the Imperialists, but of the Wirtembergers, Prussians, and Palatines, and to exhort the Princes, who had promised to furnish artillery, horses, and waggons, to send them with all possible expedition. His requests, though seconded by those of the States-General, were however to little purpose. Some Imperial troops were indeed detached from Lauterberg for the Moselle, but they kept so truly to their own usual pace, and marched so slowly, that, instead of being on the Saar the 9th or 10th of June, N. S. as they should have been, they were not arrived on the 20th, nor were there either horses or artillery provided. Prince Lewis of Baden, who had promised to come in person, came indeed as far as Creutznach, and then, falling sick, took an opportunity to go to the wells of Schwalbach and the bath at Schlungenbade, leaving these forces under the command of the Count de Frieze. Thus his former excuse of want of health and force was repeated, not without shrewd suspicions of treachery; for it appeared plainly, that the French knew what he intended to do, and their management shewed they depended on it, because they ordered no detachments to augment Villars's army. The Duke of Wirtemberg made a little more haste with four thousand men in the pay of the States, and the Prussians arrived before the grand army was obliged to decamp.

In the mean time the enemy, on the 28th The French take Huy, and be- of May, invested Huy with a detachment under the command of Count de Gasse; and, on the 10th of June, the castle surrendered, the garrison being made prisoners of war. After this Liege, the Elector of Bavaria and Marshal de Villeroi, being willing to make the best use of the Duke of Mariborough's absence, marched with their army towards Liege, and resolved to form the siege of that place. This disagreeable news had no sooner reached the Duke's army, but he received a letter from the States, wherein they represented to him "the loss of Huy; the siege of Liege, which was begun; the threats of the Elector and Marshal de Villeroi, that they would recover the former conquests of the Allies; the necessity, which there was to make a powerful diversion to oppose their enterprises; and, if that could not be done on the Moselle, the States desired him to return with his army towards the Maese." The Duke perceiving, that the delay of the German troops would render the siege of Saar-Louis abortive; the difficulty of subsisting a numerous army in a ruined Country; and the impracticableness of attacking Marshal Villars, who, besides his superiority of troops, was posted in an inaccessible camp, resolved at last to march to the relief of Liege. He decamped, on the 17th of June, and moved towards Triers, where it was resolved in a Council of war, that the forces, under his command, should march back to the Maese, except seven thousand Palatines in the pay of England and Holland, who were left for the security of Triers, and other posts on that side, under the command of Lieutenant-General Aubach. In pursuance of this resolution, the Duke, after having spent some weeks in this fruitless attempt, marched for the Netherlands by the shortest way, very much mortified at the ill usage he had received; and the Imperial troops, the Prussians, and Wirtembergers, moved towards the Upper Rhine.

The Prince of Baden's conduct, throughout this whole affair, was liable to great censure, and he was suspected to have been corrupted by

the

1705. the French; while those, who did not carry their suspicions so far, attributed his acting as he did to his pride; and thought, that he, envying the Duke of Marlborough, and apprehending, that the whole glory of the campaign would be ascribed to him, chose rather to defeat the whole design, than to see another carry away the chief honour of any successes, that might have happened.

The French take possession of Trier. Marshal Villars, having now no enemy before him, sent a detachment to reinforce the Elector of Bavaria, and another for the army under Marshal de Marfin in Alsace, and advanced with the rest towards the Saar. Upon the first notice of which, the Palatine General sent orders to the Governor of Saarbrück to quit the castle, and blow up the fortifications, which he accordingly performed. And to complete the ill conduct of the Germans, on the 25th of June (even before the enemy appeared in sight) he destroyed all the magazines at Triers, blew up the fortifications, burnt the boats designed to make bridges, and in a dishonourable manner quitted that important post, which had cost the Allies immense sums of money. The enemy immediately took possession of the place, and Villars marched to join de Marfin, and with him drove the Imperialists from the lines of Croon-Weysenburgh; and General Thungen found it very difficult to maintain himself in the lines of Lauterburgh. These unpardonable mismanagements obliged the Duke of Marlborough to send Colonel Durcl, one of his Aids de Camp, to represent the whole matter to the Emperor.

The Duke of Marlborough forces the French lines. In the mean time, the Duke, by his diligent march, arrived time enough to save the Citadel of Liege; so that the face of affairs was immediately changed in the Netherlands; for the enemy, upon advice of his approach, sent back their artillery to Namur, and retired in great precipitation to Tongeren. On the other hand, the Duke, continuing his march, arrived at Mastricht on the 27th of June, and, having taken measures with Monsieur Auverquerque and the other Generals to march towards the enemy, they decamped for that purpose; but the French thought fit to prevent them, and retired from Tongeren nearer to their lines. On the 2d of July, the Duke passed the Moselle, and advanced to Haness, while the forces under Monsieur Auverquerque marched at the same time to Theys upon the Saar. The enemy, having notice of this march, decamped in haste, and, as it were, fled into their lines, having sent away most of their heavy baggage the day before.

The French having thus secured themselves within their Lines, the Confederate Generals thought fit to undertake the siege of Huy, before they proceeded further; and, to that end, made a detachment under General Scholten, to invest that place on the 6th of July, while the Duke of Marlborough and Monsieur Auverquerque made each a small motion to cover the siege. Two days after, the batteries began to play against fort Picard; and, the dispositions being made for attacking it, the Allies soon made themselves masters of the covered way, and were resolutely climbing up the fort, which the enemy perceiving, fled into the Castle, having quitted the Red Fort two hours before. The next day, July the 11th, a battery was brought to play against the castle, and another was erected in fort St. Joseph; so that, a considerable breach being made, the enemy beat a parley, and demanded to march out, and be conducted to Namur; which being refused, they surrendered upon the same conditions, as had been granted to the Dutch two months before, the Governor and Garrison being made prisoners of war. The garrison consisted of five hundred men, commanded by Monsieur de St. Pierre, a Brigadier-General in the French service; besides whom, there was a Governor appointed by the Elector of Cologne. They marched out of the place on the 12th, to the number of four hundred and fifty men, besides the sick and wounded, and were conducted to Mastricht.

After the reduction of Huy, the Duke of Marlborough was resolved to undertake some more considerable action; and, as nothing appeared more advantageous in its consequence, than the attacking the enemy's lines, he sent General Hompesch to propose it to the States-General, who returned answer, "That, having an intire confidence in his conduct and prudence, they left it intirely to him to do what ever he should think fit, for the good of the common cause." Upon this, the Duke held a general Council of war, wherein that undertaking was debated; but, nothing being concluded the first time, a second Council was called, when some of the Dutch Generals opposed it; but Monsieur Auverquerque, the Prince of Hesse, Count de Noyelles, and some others, gave unanswerable reasons, why it ought to be undertaken: so the attack was resolved on.

The enemy were posted along their lines with near a hundred battalions, and a hundred and forty-six squadrons; and the Allies having ninety-two battalions, and a hundred and sixty squadrons, the two armies were pretty near equal. It was resolved therefore to make a feint, to divide the enemy's forces; and, accordingly, the army under Monsieur Auverquerque made a motion on the other side of the Mebaigne, and the Duke of Marlborough made another at the same time, as if he intended to support him in the attack of the lines about Messelen, where they were not so strong as in other parts. This stratagem succeeded to the wishes of the two Generals; for these motions, particularly the passing the Mebaigne, gave great jealousy to the French, so that they bestowed their chief attention on that side. Whereupon the Duke made the following disposition, in order to march with the whole army, in the night, between the 17th and 18th of July.

Lieutenant-General Scholten having rejoined the army with ten battalions and ten squadrons only, thirteen squadrons more out of the right of the Duke's second line were added to them; and five of those squadrons were given to Colonel Chanclos, who, being perfectly acquainted with the lines and the nature of the ground, was ordered to march at the head of all. Eleven battalions, and all the horse of the right wing of the Duke's army, to the number of twenty-four squadrons, were also detached, in order to march at the head of the first line; and those two detachments were to be commanded by Count Noyelles, General of the infantry, having under him the Lieutenant-Generals Lumley, Hompesch, Scholten, and Count d'Ost Frise; the Major-Generals Wood, Ross, Erbach, Welder, Prince of Hesse-Homburg, and Weack; and the Brigadiers Iley, Palmo, Baldwin, Sacken, 1705. ken, Gravendorf, Poforn, Mereditb, and Hamilton. On the 17th about four in the afternoon, the Duke gave orders for the whole army to get ready to march; that all the baggage should assemble at fix near Tourine, behind the camp, under the guard of a Colonel with four thousand foot, and a hundred horse; that, at nine in the evening, Count Noyelles should advance with the two bodies abovementioned, filing off by their right, that which assembled before their first line to the left, and that of Lieutenant-General Scholten to the right, marching through the route, which the guides would shew them, directly towards Wangen and Elixheim, which two posts they were to attack, if the posture of the enemy would permit. That the Duke's army should march likewise at ten o'clock, following the same route, which the two detachments took: That the artillery should move at the same time on the right of the army: That Monsieur Auverquerque's artillery should follow the same way: That, an hour before the army marched, all the horse of the left wing of the Duke's army should move along the two lines, and repair to the right of the infantry: That at the same time the body of horse commanded by the Earl of Albemarle should advance forwards from their camp: That Monsieur Auverquerque's army should repass the Meibaigne over the twelve bridges made there for that purpose, and should join, with the right of his foot, the left of the Duke's army: That, when Monsieur Auverquerque should begin to move, he should detach a party of dragoons towards Gerbise, to give the alarm in the enemy's line on that side; and that the detachment commanded by the Lord Albemarle should bring up the rear of all. This disposition being made, and the gun, which is usually fired for the tattoo, being now the signal for taking down the tents, the two armies began their march between ten and eleven in the evening, filing off by their right in two columns, leaving Cortis, Montenaken, Houtein, and St. Gertruydenland, to their right; and the villages Troyne, Cras, Auvergne, Baudwin, Reilshoven, Over-Winden, and Neer-Winden, to their left; and marching directly towards their line, where the two first detachments were to attempt to force their passage at Elixheim, the castle of Wangb, and the villages of Wangb, Neer-bespen, and Oostmalen.

The darkness of the night somewhat puzzled the guides, who conducted these detachments, so that it was half an hour past four in the morning, and broad day, before they came near the abovementioned posts, which, according to information, were found to be but thinly guarded. Count Noyelles caused the castle of Wangb, which defended a stone-bridge, that was there on the Geete, to be attacked; but the French immediately abandoned that post, and gave an opportunity to the grenadiers, who were ordered on that service, to march forwards, and attack the barrier of that line, which the guards did not defend much better than the other had done the castle, and so the troops entered the line on that side with little or no opposition, although the enemy had twelve squadrons of dragoons incamped behind Oostmalen (within a cannon-shot of the place, where the first detachment entered) who immediately mounted their horses, but durst not advance to defend their barriers. At the same time three battalions pos-

1705. sessed themselves of the bridge and village of Heilsheim, a quarter of a league from Wangb on the left, which was done with as little opposition. Nor did Lieutenant-General Scholten meet with greater resistance at the villages of Over-bespen and Neer-bespen, so that, being masters of those bridges and barriers, and having made several other bridges, the horse went over them, and immediately ranged themselves in order on the eminence, extending their right towards the village of Hackendoren, and some battalions drew up along the line, and behind the horse.

While the pioneers were busy in making passages through the line, ten of the enemy's squadrons, and four battalions, were perceived between the villages of Gonchancourt and Eftmale; but they gave time to the Confederate forces to extend themselves, endeavouring only to advance to the village of Elixheim. Count Noyelles caused all the troops, which he had with him, to go over as fast as possible; and thereupon, the Duke of Marlborough arriving with his whole army, his cavalry went over the line with extraordinary expedition, as the rest had done, and so they all made up towards the enemy, who by this time were reinforced to the number of fifty squadrons and twenty battalions, and advanced with great resolution behind the hollow way, that goes from Elixheim to Tirlemont. This obliged the Confederate horse to make a stand a few minutes, till some battalions advancing lined the hollow way, and, firing upon the enemy's horse, obliged them to retire out of the reach of their muskets, and to form themselves before their infantry, which gave an opportunity for the Confederate horse to pass the hollow way. In the mean time, the French caused eight pieces of cannon with treble barrels to advance, with which they made a terrible fire on the Confederate horse. But, the Duke of Marlborough being come in person at the head of fresh squadrons, and seeing, that the enemy were continually receiving reinforcements, and that their infantry was going to join them, he resolved to charge them with horse only; which was done with that ardour and courage, that the cavalry of the two Crowns being soon broken and put to flight, they went to rally themselves behind their infantry, whilst his victorious horse possessed themselves of the cannon and ammunition-waggons. The enemy, being joined with some squadrons, and having interlined some battalions with them, moved again towards the Confederates; but the latter, being likewise reinforced, and sustained by their infantry, made advances to receive them.

The right of the Confederate horse, coming too near the hedges of the village of Eftmale, which were lined with French and Bavarian foot, were somewhat disordered by their fire, and obliged to shrink back. But, having soon after extended themselves more towards the right, to make way for some battalions, that marched against the enemy's foot, they both charged with that bravery and briskness, that the enemy's horse was soon defeated and cut in pieces, and their infantry, left alone in the plain, with great difficulty got away in disorder between the villages of Heilsheim and Gerbise, where they met with the rest of the army, and formed themselves as well as they could. In the mean time, the Duke of Marlborough caused all the rest 1705. rest of the troops to enter the lines, and extended the right of his army towards the Great Geete before Tirlemont, in which Town they took the battalion of Montuc, which, upon the first summons, surrendered at discretion.

In this action the Marquis d'Aligre and Count de Horne, Lieutenant-Generals, a Major-General, two Brigadiers, and several other Officers of all ranks, besides abundance of private men, were made prisoners. All the troops of the Allies behaved themselves with great bravery and resolution; but, amongst the horse, the regiment of Brigadier Cadogan distinguished themselves, having had the honour to charge first, which they did with such success, that they defeated four squadrons of Bavarian guards, drove them through two battalions of their own foot, and took four standards, and all this with the loss of only Lieutenant Austin and some few men. Nor was the loss of the other troops greater in proportion. The Duke of Marlborough, having very much exposed himself in the action, was in great danger of his life; for, as he was leading on several squadrons, a French or Bavarian Officer quitted his post, and advanced sword in hand to attack him; but, as he was raising himself upon his stirrups to reach him, he fell off his horse, and was presently killed. The Bavarian horse, which consisted of twenty-four squadrons, offering to oppose the Confederates, was almost intirely ruined; as were likewise the two regiments of Alsace and la Marque.

The body of troops, commanded by Monsieur d'Aligre, being thus defeated, the Elector of Bavaria and Marshal de Villeroi consulted for the safety of the rest of the army; and, de-camping in the night of the Confederates, passed the Geete and the Dyle with all imaginable diligence, and possessed themselves of the strong camp at Park, with their left at Roselaer, and their right against the height of Louvain at Winfelsen. From thence the Elector wrote to the Baron of Malknecht, his favourite, in this manner: "Dear Baron, God forgive those, who suffered themselves to be surprized. "The whole army is here, and the evil is not so great as to be past remedy. The Country of Brabant may be saved, as well as Antwerp, if it pleased God. I am well, but exceedingly fatigued."

On the other hand, the Duke of Marlborough's army passed the Great Geete, and incamped with the right at Rosbeek, and the left behind Tirlemont; and that of Monsieur Auverquerque extended itself with the right to Grain, and the left to Elixheim. The next day the confederate army moved, and in their march took about one thousand two hundred prisoners, who could not follow the precipitate march of the enemy; and incamped the same evening within cannon-shot of Louvain.

But though by this success the enemy were forced to abandon Dieft, Sichem, Archeot, and some other small places; yet the suffering them to possess themselves of the strong post of Park was thought a very great oversight. Some will have it, that the troops were too much fatigued to march to that camp the same day after the action; while others pretend, that some of the Dutch Generals were against it. The Duke afterwards endeavoured to force some pass upon the Dyle, but, not succeeding, he 1705. marched from thence to Meldert, and sent the Baron de Honpesch to propose a new project to the States-General, who approved of it by directions to their Deputies in the army, to make two or three marches without calling a Council of war, to favour the design formed by the Duke. To countenance that expedition, Baron Spaar's Spaar, who commanded a small body of Dutch expedition. troops in Flanders, marched from Riemen with all his grenadiers, and a sufficient number of fusileers to support them, being followed by the rest of the forces under his command, and in his march defeated a party of French troops. He came in the night to Rebott on the canal, that goes from Bruges to Ghent, where his men made a bridge and passed over it, although the enemy had a guard there, who pretended to make some opposition. After this, he attacked their lines, which were defended by several forts, forced them sword in hand at Lovendegen, and, in less than three quarters of an hour, took possession of four of those forts, and made several officers, with three hundred private men, prisoners at discretion. He then marched towards Bruges, but, having intelligence, that the enemy were advancing towards him with a superior force, which they had drawn out of several garrisons in the French and Spanish Flanders, he thought fit to retire, carrying away with him several hostages, for the security of the payment of contributions; and having burnt the palisadoes, houses, and Corps de guard, along the French lines, thrown the cannon, he found there, into the canal, and destroyed all the ammunition.

The Duke of Marlborough, having left two battalions at Tirlemont, and as many at Dieft, for the security of these places, marched with his army from Meldert, and incamped at Corbais; the Dutch forces, under the command of the French Auverquerque, advancing at the same time to St. Martin's. The next day the two armies continued their march to Genap, and there united into one body; and the day following advanced to Fischermont, the right being at Hulpen, and the left at Braine la Leu; General Churchill being detached at the head of the line with twenty battalions and as many squadrons. In that day's march, Auverquerque caused one of the posts of the enemy, called Waterlo, defended by Brigadier Pasteur, with two regiments of dragoons and as many battalions of foot, to be attacked by a detachment commanded by Lieutenant-General Dompere, who drove the enemy from that post, and pursued them about a league in the wood of Soignies.

This sudden march of the Confederates kept the enemy in great apprehensions, and gave them an equal fear for some places in Brabant and Flanders. However, upon the Duke of Marlborough's advancing from Ghent to Hulpen, the Elector of Bavaria and the Marshal de Villeroi only stretched out their right to Over-Elche near the Wood of Soignies, and kept still their left at Neer-Elche, with the little river Elche before them, by which means they covered both Brussels and Louvain.

On the 18th of August, by break of day, the Confederate army filed off with the right wing in two columns, and passed the long narrow road of Hulpen, where they were not a little surprized to find no enemy to defend that difficult pass. About noon, the whole army was 1705. were opened on the 19th, and the attacks were carried on with so much vigour, that the garrison, consisting of about four hundred men, surrendered, on the 24th, prisoners of war. The Confederates found in the place four hundred sacks of meal, four pieces of cannon, four hundred muskets, and twelve barrels of powder; and the taking of it gave an opportunity to the Imperialists closely to block up Fort-Louis. On the 28th, Hagenau (1) was invested by a strong detachment, commanded by General Thunberg, having under him the Generals Erffa and Arnsheim. The Polish infantry of the King of Prussia, and that of Wurtemberg, were employed in that siege, with twenty squadrons: And, though the place had a good counterescarp, a large ditch full of water, and a strong wall, yet the garrison made but a slender resistance, offering to surrender the 5th of October upon articles; but, none being allowed, but to be made prisoners of war, they resolved to quit the place in the night, and retire to Savern. The place not being invested on that side, they put their design in execution, to the great dissatisfaction of Prince Lewis of Baden. The taking of Drusenheim and Hagenau enabled the Germans to secure their quarters on that side of the Rhine, and very much facilitated the projects of the ensuing campaign. Thus nothing was done by that noble army, under the Prince of Baden, equal either to their numbers or strength, or to the reputation, which he had formerly acquired. This was contrary to the general expectation; for it was thought, that, being at the head of so great an army, he would have studied to signalize himself, if it had been but to rival the glory, which the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene had acquired.

The Emperor for Leopold V.
died in
May 1705.
Busnet.

The Emperor Leopold V. died in May this year. He was the most knowing and the most virtuous Prince of his communion; only he wanted the judgment, which was necessary for conducting great affairs in such critical times. He was almost always betrayed; and yet he was firm to those, who had the address to insinuate themselves into his good opinion and confidence, that it was not possible to let him see those miscarriages, which ruined his affairs so often, and brought them sometimes near the last extremities. Of these every body else seemed more sensible than he himself. He was devout and strict in his religion, and was so implicit in his submission to those Priests, who had credit with him, and particularly the Jesuits, that he owed all his troubles to their counsels. The persecutions, they began in Hungary, raised one great war; which gave the Turks occasion to besiege Vienna, by which he was almost entirely swallowed up. This danger did not produce more caution: after the peace of Carlowitz, there was so much violence and oppression in the government of Hungary, both of Papists and Protestants, that this raised another war there; which, in conjunction with the revolt of the Elector of Bavaria, brought him a second time very near utter ruin. Yet, he could not be prevailed upon, either to punish, or so much as suspect those, who had so fatally intangled his affairs, that without foreign aid nothing could have extricated him. He was naturally merciful to a fault; for even the punishment of criminals was uneasy to him. Yet all the cruelty in the persecution of Heretics seemed to raise no relentings in him. It could not but be observed by all Protestants, how much the ill influence of the Popish Religion appeared in him, who was one of the mildest and most virtuous Princes of the age, since cruelty in the matters of religion had a full course under him, though it was as contrary to his natural temper as it was to his interest, and proved oftener than once almost fatal to all his affairs. His Son Joseph, elected King of the Romans, succeeded him both in his Hereditary and Elective Dignities. It was given out, that he would apply himself much to business, and would avoid those rocks, on which his father had struck, and almost split, and correct those errors, to which his father's easiness had exposed him. He promised to those Ministers, whom the Queen and the States had in his court, that he would offer all reasonable terms to the Hungarians; and he consented to their setting on foot a treaty, in which they were to be the Mediators, and become the Guarantees for the observance of such articles, as should be agreed on; and he gave great hopes, that he would not continue in that subjection to the Priests, to which his father had been captivated. He desired to confer with the Duke of Marlborough, and to concert all affairs with him. The Queen consented to this, and the Duke set out from the army, and arrived on the 12th of November N. S. at Vienna, where he was treated with great freedom and confidence, and had all the assurances, that could be given him in words. He found, that the Emperor was highly dissatisfied with Prince Lewis of Baden; but that Prince had such credit in the Empire, especially with the Circles of Swabia and Franconia, that it was necessary to bear with that, which could not be helped. The Duke of Marlborough returned through the Hereditary Dominions to Berlin, where he learned so perfectly to accommodate himself to the King of Prussia's temper, that he succeeded in every thing, that he proposed, and renewed all treaties for one year longer. He went from thence to the court of Hanover, and there he gave them full assurances of the Queen's adhering firmly to their interests, in maintaining the succession to the Crown in that family; with which the Elector was fully satisfied; but it appeared the Electress had a mind to be invited over into England. From thence he came back to the Hague, where having settled several important matters with the States-General, particularly the taking ten thousand men more into the pay of England and Holland, to reinforce Prince Eugene's army in Italy, he returned to England, and arrived at St. James's on the 30th of December (2).

Prince

(1) Hagenau is a city of Germany, in the Circle of the Upper Rhine, and Lantgravedom of Alsacia, once Imperial, but in an uncertain state, since the taking of Landau by the Germans in 1702; for, in 1703, the French re-possessed it, and, in 1704, drew lines by it, which Prince Lewis of Baden forced this campaign, and took the town. It was retaken by the French in 1706. It stands on the river Maierbrun, thirteen miles almost North of Strasbourg, and as many West of Baden.

(2) The Earl of Sunderland was sent Envoy Extraordinary

1705. Prince Eugene encountered this year with great difficulties in Italy. He had a weak army, and it was both ill provided, and ill paid. He was long shut up within the country of Bergamo: at last he broke through Cusano, where there was a very hot action between him and the Duke of Vendosme. Both sides pretended they had the victory, yet the Duke repassed the river, and the Imperialists kept the field of battle. The French threatened Turin with a siege; but they began with Cibias, which held out some months, and was at last abandoned. The Duke de Feuillade commanded the army near Turin, and seemed to dispose every thing in order to a siege; but the design was turned upon Nice, though late in the year. That place made a brave resistance for many weeks, but in December was obliged to capitulate, and demolished by the French.

The firmness, which the Duke of Savoy expressed in all these losses was the wonder of all Europe. He had now but a small army of eight thousand foot and four thousand horse, and had scarce territory enough to support these. He had no considerable places left him but Coni and Turin. But he seemed resolved to be driven out of all, rather than abandon the Grand Alliance. His Dukes with all the Clergy, and indeed all his Subjects, desired him to submit to the necessity of his affairs. But nothing could shake him. He admitted none of his Bishops nor Clergy into his Councils, nor had any certain Confessor, but sent sometimes to the Dominicans; and sometimes to the Franciscans, for a Priest, when he intended to go to Confession.

Gibraltar was defended with great bravery and resolution. Sir John Leake (as has been related, who was left with part of the confederate fleet in those seas, upon notice that Pointi with a squadron of French men of war was arrived at Gibraltar in order to besiege the place by sea, as the Spaniards had done by land, sailed from Lisbon in October, and came so unexpectedly that he surprized two of the enemy's frigates of thirty-four guns each, one of twelve, a fireship and two English prizes, all which, being run ashore, were burnt; and one of thirty guns was taken. Whereupon, having reinforced the garrison with two thousand men, he returned to Lisbon.

In the end of February following, Sir John Leake received advice that Pointi was again arrived in the bay of Gibraltar with fourteen men of war and two fire-ships, and that the French and Spanish army designed to make a general assault upon the town. Upon this advice, Sir John Leake sailed again from Lisbon to its relief. In his way he met Admiral Dilkes, who was sent from England to increase his force. By this addition he had a strong fleet of thirty men of war, and therefore held on his course with the utmost expedition, hoping to find Pointi in the bay of Gibraltar. But, on the 9th of March, he discovered five sail of the enemy's sailing out of the bay to follow the rest of their squadron, which went off upon the notice of his approach. He followed them closely, and chased to, and soon after one of them, called the Argos of sixty guns, was taken; and seven or eight others, the Adrest of sixty-two, and the Magnus of fifty-six, after some little resistance. The other two, the Magnus of seventy-four, and the Lis of eighty six guns, were run ashore and burnt by the enemies themselves near Morilla. Sir John sailed up the Mediterranean, to see if he could overtake the rest of the French squadron; but, after a fruitless pursuit for some days, he returned back to Gibraltar, which was now so well supplied, that the Spaniards lost all hopes of being able to take it, and therefore raised the siege, turning it into a very feeble blockade.

The campaign in Portugal had a very promising beginning. For the vigorous defence of Gibraltar, as it obliged the French and Spaniards to draw most of their forces that way, so it gave an opportunity to the Portuguese and their Allies to invade Spain, both on the frontiers of Boya, and those of Almaga. This, however, was undertaken against the advice of some great men of the Court of Lisbon, who urged, that, considering how much the auxiliary forces had been weakened by the detachments sent by the Lord Galloway to Gibraltar, the confederate army could not take the field, till they were joined by the recruits expected from England and Holland. But the Earl of Galloway over-ruled that pretence, and, by his care and industry, the preparations for an early campaign were not much retarded by the King of Portugal's indisposition, during which the Queen Dowager of England was intrusted with the Regency of the Kingdom. Most of the troops appointed to take the field, being assembled near Evreux, they began their march from thence on the 24th of April, N. S. the Comte de Galvezas, a Portuguese, having the chief command; the Comte de la Corfona, the Earl of Galloway, and Baron Fagei, commanding under him, each his week alternately; the Comte de Villaverde, being General of the horse, and the Viscount of Barbarena, General of the artillery. Four days after, the army, being joined by a considerable number of horse and foot from Elvas, was found to consist of above twenty-four thousand men; and, having no enemy to oppose them in the field, the Generals resolved to attack their fortified towns. Valencia d'Alcantara was first besieged, and carried by storm on the 14th of May, N. S. The garrison of Albuquerque, having the same fate, surrendered the place, on the 22nd of that month, upon articles. After which, several Councils were held, in which the Earl of Galloway and General Fagel proposed the siege of Badajoz; but it was opposed by the Portuguese upon traordinary to the Emperor Joseph, with compliments of condolence on the death of his father the Emperor Leopold, and of congratulation on his Imperial Majesty's Accession to the Throne; both which had been promised to our Court by Count Galen, the Imperial Envoy Extraordinary, upon which something happened worth remembering. It was debated in Council, whether the Queen and the Court should be intending for the late Emperor, and the majority of the Council gave their opinion for the negative? because the Emperors of Germany, assuming too great a superiority over other crowned heads, had hitherto refused to mourn for the Monarchs of Great-Britain. But Count Galen, having in his Master's name promised, that for the future the Emperor would mourn for the Kings and Queens of England, her Majesty went into mourning for the late Emperor.

1705. upon several pretences, The English and Dutch Generals continuing their instances, and offering several expedients to remove all difficulties, it was resolved to draw near Badajoz, and endeavour to fall on Marshall de Tbesse, who was posted with about four thousand horse and foot on the banks of the Guadiana, to cover that important place. Accordingly the army marched, on the 4th of June, N. S. and made some preparations to pass the Guadiana; but, not being able to get a sufficient number of pontoons to make bridges, and wanting other necessaries for a siege, it was thought proper to lay aside that enterprize, and, in the mean time, to send the troops into quarters of refreshment.

While these things passed on the side of Alentejo, the Marquis das Minas, who commanded the Portuguese forces in the province of Beyra, attacked the town of Salvatierra, and made the garrison prisoners of war; after which, the Portuguese plundered and burnt Sarca, which the French garrison and inhabitants had abandoned upon their approach. But the Marquis das Minas's progress was soon stopped by a body of French and Spaniards, which marched against him, and obliged him to retire to Panamacos.

Notwithstanding the Earl of Galway's incessant solicitations, and the solemn engagements of the Portuguese to King Charles of Spain to take the field in the beginning of September, in order to give the Spaniards a diversion, they continued in their quarters till the end of that month, when, all the Confederate forces being drawn together in the neighbourhood of Eivas, several Councils of War were held to regulate the operations of the autumn campaign. Some proposed to march directly to Merida, to destroy the magazines, which the enemy had in that place; others, to march into Spain another way than by Esfremadura; and others again, the siege of Badajoz, which the Earl of Galway at last prevailed with the Portuguese to undertake, as the most proper means to give the enemy so considerable a diversion, that they should not be able to oppose the Earl of Peterborough's attempt on Catalonia.

The Generals being sensible, that the divisions among them about the punctilios of command had hitherto been a great obstruction to the execution of their projects, resolved, if possible, to prevent the like inconveniences for the future; and, in order thereto, agreed, that the Earl of Galway, Baron Fagel, and the Comde de Corsana should command each in turn, for a week, as Camp-Masters-General, under the Marquis das Minas Generalissimo. This great difficulty about the command being removed, the army marched on the 1st of October, N. S. towards Badajoz, which they reached the 3d, and opened the trenches the next day. The siege was carried on with so good success, that it was thought almost impossible, that the enterprize should miscarry, as it did by an unforeseen accident. On the 11th of October, in the afternoon, a bomb of the enemy falling on one of the batteries of the Besiegers, and blowing up the powder with some of the gunners, the Earl of Galway and Baron Fagel repaired thither immediately, to encourage the foldiers, and give the necessary directions; and, as they had both their arms lifted up, a cannon-ball from an old Castle passed between them, took off the sleeve of Baron Fagel, and struck off the Lord Gal- way's right-hand, a little below the elbow. The Earl being obliged to be carried away, Baron Fagel took upon him the command of the army, and direction of the siege; and the batteries continued firing with so great execution, that the Besiegers reckoned to storm the place on the 15th. But the Marquis de Tbesse, having assembled three thousand horse and five thousand foot at Talavera, marched the night between the 13th and 14th with such expedition and secrecy, that in the morning they were drawn up in battalia, flanking the left wing of the Confederates. After some time spent in consultations, the whole Confederate army passed the Guadiana, in order to fight the enemy; but the Marquis de Tbesse, having thrown a relief of a thousand men into Badajoz, retired over the Cabeira, with as great diligence as he advanced; and, on the 17th of October, N. S. the Confederates thought fit to raise the siege. Baron Fagel, who being weary of a service, where there was little or no harmony among the Generals, had some time before demanded and obtained to be recalled, set out immediately for Lisbon, and there embarked for Holland, with the mortification of having the miscarriage before Badajoz imputed to him, of which he endeavoured to clear himself in print. As for the Earl of Galway, besides his being consoled by the King of Portugal in a letter, and receiving another from the Queen, written all with her own hand, he had the satisfaction of having it generally believed, that, if the disposition, which he had made for preventing the enemy's design, and was approved in the Council of war the morning he lost his arm, had been executed, the Confederates would not have been obliged to raise the siege of Badajoz.

By this time all Europe was attentive to the great success of the Confederates in Catalonia. Towards the latter end of May, the English fleet, with about five thousand land-forces on board, under the joint command of Sir Cloudfely Shovel and the Earl of Peterborough, sailed from St. Helen's, and arrived at Lisbon the 20th of June, N. S. a week after the Dutch fleet, commanded by Admiral Allemonde, was come into that river. The Earl of Galway, with the other Generals, being about the same time come to Lisbon, several Councils were held about the intended expedition of the Confederate fleet: and, upon the pressing instances of the Earl of Peterborough, the Earl of Galway was prevailed with to let him take with him the best part of two English regiments of dragoons, the Lord Raby's and Cunningham's. The prince of Hesse d. Rhynstadt, arriving at this juncture at Lisbon from Gibraltar, gave King Charles III. positive assurances of the inclinations of the Province of Catalonia and Kingdom of Valencia to declare for him, which, together with his being weary of Portugal, made him resolve to try his fortune with the Earl of Peterborough. This, however, was vehemently opposed by some Spanish Grandees; but, their reasons being over-ruled by the Earl of Peterborough's stronger arguments, the King was confirmed in his resolution, and having sent back the Prince of Armstadt to Gibraltar, to get the garrison of that place in readiness to embark, he went on board the Ranelagh with the Earl of Peterborough. They put to sea on the 28th of July, N. S. and, a few days after, arrived in the Bay of Gibraltar, where he was received 1705. as lawful Sovereign; and having taken on board the battalion of English Guards, and three old regiments, which had lately so bravely defended the place, and left two new raised battalions in garrison there, they sailed again the 5th of August, N. S. Six days after they came to anchor in the Bay of Altea, in order to water; and the Earl of Peterborough caused a manifesto to be published in Spanish, declaring, "That he was not come into these parts to take possession of any place, in the name of her Britannic Majesty, or of the States-General, but to maintain the just right of the most August House of Austria to the Monarchy of Spain, and to defend the good and loyal subjects of the Spanish Monarchy, and free them from the insupportable yoke of a Government of foreigners." Hereupon, all the inhabitants of Altea, and the neighbouring villages, came to acknowledge his Catholic Majesty, imploring his protection, and brought with them the fruits of the country, and other necessary provisions. At the same time, about eight hundred or a thousand men in the adjacent mountains, being weary of the French yoke, declared for King Charles III. and seized the town of Denea, not far from Altea Bay. His Catholic Majesty appointed Major-General Ramos, who had assisted the Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt in the siege of Gibraltar, to be Governor of that place, sending with him about four hundred men for its greater security. All this while the motions of the Confederate fleet not only kept the French and Spaniards in alarms, but the Allies themselves in suspense; there being various conjectures about the true design of this expedition. It appears by a letter from on board the Britannia in Altea Bay, dated August 14, N. S. "That the Earl of Peterborough having got nineteen battalions of infantry, about one thousand three hundred horse, with a good train of artillery, and the King of Spain on board the fleet, his Lordship designed to have gone directly for Italy, where, with the forces that were to join him, either from the Duke of Savoy or Prince Eugene, he might have driven the French out of Italy, and set his Royal Highness at liberty to employ his forces another way. But, when letters arrived at Lisbon from Turin and Genoa, advising of the good disposition of the Catalans in favour of Charles III. that four thousand of them had actually taken up arms, this broke his Lordship's former measures, and obliged him, contrary to his inclinations, to frame designs upon Catalonia, according to new orders." But, whatever ground there was for this, the fleet, having sailed from Altea Bay about the middle of August, N. S. arrived in the Bay of Barcelona the 22d of the same month (1).

The Prince of Anhalt d'Armstadt being sent before with two frigates, to inquire into the posture of affairs in those parts, he put into Alteira, four leagues from Barcelona; and having advised the people of Vick, who had declared for King Charles, to come down to the sea-side, he rejoined the fleet on the 23d of August; and the infantry were landed, not only without any disturbance, but even with the assistance of the country people, who expressed great joy for the arrival of the fleet, and the Catholic King. The next day, the dragoons, and part of the horse, were set on shore, and joined the rest of the forces, which were incamped about a quarter of a mile from the town of Barcelona on the East-side, in a place well fortified by nature. The circumference of the town being so large, that the forces from the fleet were not sufficient to invest it, the people of the country assisted them in securing all the avenues.

After the artillery and heavy baggage were landed, King Charles resolved to go on shore, to encourage the expedition by his presence, and shew himself to the people of the country, who came from divers parts in great multitudes, to see him. Accordingly, he landed on the 28th, N. S. at four in the evening, and, when he went from on board, the whole fleet saluted him, that by this the inhabitants of Barcelona might be assured, that his Catholic Majesty was come with the fleet. As soon as the King got on shore, an infinite number of people, who came from Vick, and divers other towns and villages, with great acclamations, and repeated cries of Long live the King, ran to the water-side, cast themselves at his feet, and kissed his hand with all possible demonstrations of joy, inasmuch that it was difficult for him to get from among so great and joyful a multitude. But at last, mounting on horseback, he rid to the camp, where the forces were all drawn up in a line to receive him.

Barcelona had a garrison in it of five thousand men, who were commanded by Officers intirely in the interests of King Philip. It seemed a very unreasonable thing to undertake the siege of such a place with so small a force: They could not depend on the raw and undisciplined multitudes, which came in to join them, who, if things succeeded not in their hands, would soon abandon them, or perhaps study to merit a pardon by cutting their throats.

A Council of war was called to consult on what could be proposed and done, in which both English and Dutch were all of opinion, that the siege could not be undertaken with so small a force (2), those within being as strong as they were; nor did they see any thing else worth the attempting. They therefore thought, that no time was to be lost, but that they were all to

(1) Bishop Burnet says, The first design of this expedition was concerted with the Duke of Savoy; and the forces, they had on board, were either to join him, or to make an attempt on Naples and Sicily, as should be found most advisable: There were agents employed in different parts of Spain, to give an account of the disposition people were in, and of what seemed most practicable. A body of men rose in Catalonia about Vick; upon the knowledge King Charles had of this, and upon other advertisements, that were sent to our Court, of the dispositions of those of that Prince, the orders which King Charles desired were sent, and brought by a runner, that was dispatched from the Queen to the fleet; so the fleet steered to the coast of Catalonia, to try what could be done there. The Earl of Peterborough, who had set his heart on Italy, and on Prince Eugene, was not a little displeased with this, as appeared in a long letter from him, which the Lord Treasurer shewed the Bishop. Vol. II. 420.

(2) Dr. Friend, in his Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, p. 9. 3d Edit. observes, That his Lordship, upon incamping before Barce- lona,

1705. go again on board, and to consider what course was next to be taken before the season was spent, when the fleet would be obliged to return back again; and, if they could not fix themselves any where before that time, they must sail back with the fleet. The Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt only was of opinion, that they ought to sit down before Barcelona, alleging, that he had secret intelligence of the good affections of many in the town, who were well known to him, and on whom he relied; and he undertook to answer for their success. This could not satisfy those, who knew nothing of his secrets, and consequently could only judge of things by what appeared to them. The debate lasted some hours: In conclusion the King himself spoke near half an hour; he resumed the whole debate; he answered all objections, that were made against the siege, and treated every one of those, who had made them, as he answered them, with particular civilities. He supported the truth of what the Prince of Hesse had asserted, as being known to himself. He said in the State, in which his affairs then stood, nothing could be proposed, that had not great difficulties in it: All was doubtful, and much must be put to hazard. But this seemed less dangerous than any other thing, that was proposed; many of his subjects had come and declared for him to the hazard of their lives; it became him therefore to let them see, that he would run the same hazard with them. He defired, that they would stay so long with him, till such attempts should be made, that all the world might be convinced, that nothing could be done; and he hoped, that, till that appeared, they would not leave him. He added, that, if their orders obliged them to leave him, yet he could not leave his own subjects. Upon this, they resolved to sit down before Barcelona, being all amazed to see so young a Prince, so little practised in business, argue in to him with so much force, and conclude with such heroic resolutions. This proved happy in many respects. It came to be known afterwards, that the Catalans and Miquelets, who had joined them, hearing, that they were resolved to abandon them and go back to their ships, had resolved, either out of repentment, or that they might merit their pardon, to murder all of them as they could. When this small army sat down before Barcelona, they found they were too weak to besiege it, and could scarce mount their cannon. When they came to examine their stores, they found them very defective, and far short of the quantities, that by their lists they expected to find. It soon appeared, that the intelligence was true concerning the inclinations of those in the town: Their affections were intire to King Charles; but they were overawed by the garrison, and by Velasco, who, as well as the Duke of Popoli, who had the chief command, was devoted to the interests of King Philip. Deferters came daily from the town, lona, found the scene of affairs quite otherwise, than what he was promised he should meet with. Instead of ten thousand men in arms, to cover his landing, and strengthen his camp, he saw only so many highers and sutlers flocking into it. Instead of a City in a weak Condition, and ready to surrender upon the appearance of his troops, he found an orderly garrison, and a force almost equal to his army. In these difficulties, his Lordship, as he was obliged by his instructions, called frequent Councils of war; wherein day after day, for above a fortnight together, it was often unanimously, and always by a Majority, agreed, that, considering the weakness of our forces, and the strength of the enemy; considering, that our batteries, as our Engineers declared, would be almost as long a raising on the side of the town we were masters of, as the fleet could well stay: In short, considering the extreme want of every thing necessary towards such an attempt, the siege was utterly impracticable. His Lordship did indeed twice give his vote for the undertaking; but from the councils of war it will appear, that it was only out of the extreme passion he had to comply with the King of Spain's desires, and not out of any confidence he had of succeeding. At the same time his Lordship proposed and offered to his Majesty, either to sail with the whole fleet to Italy, in order to support the Duke of Savoy; or to march by land along the sea-coast, where, with the countenance and assistance of the fleet, many towns of consequence might be reduced, the whole country disposed to declare for, and pay obedience to his Catholic Majesty, as some part of the neighbouring parts had done; and, upon any reasonable encouragement from Catalonia, and the Kingdoms of Valencia and Aragon, winter-quarters might be secured, and a body of troops raised out of them, which might enable his Majesty to march to Madrid next spring. But the Author of the Impartial Inquiry into the Management of the War in Spain, printed at London in 1712. in 8vo. observes, p. 27, that this extreme passion, which the Earl of Peterborough had to comply with the King of Spain's desires, did not last long, as appears from those very Councils of war, which are published by Dr. Friend; for in the first Council held on the 16th of August 1705. O. S. the siege of Barcelona was judged impracticable, namine contradicente; on the 22d a particular attack upon the curtain was proposed, and the Earl the only person, who approved it; on the 25th a general attack was proposed for eighteen days, which was agreed to only by the Earl, and the Brigadiers, Stanhope and St. Anand; and on the 26th it was resolved by all the Generals, at the King of Spain's request, to try their fortune eighteen Days before the Town. But on the 28th another Council was held, wherein the Earl was as forward as any for embarking the troops again; and seems to have furnished the Generals with the reasons of that resolution; which is the more probable, because the reasons alledged in that Council were, that they had not been assisted either by the fleet, or the country people, as they expected; that the King was uncertain in his resolutions, sometimes for a march, sometimes for a siege; and that the Deputies of the Catalans had declared to his Lordship, that they would not promise any number of men to work in the trenches or batteries, or in any places where they should be exposed to fire. It is certain, that in the Council of the 26th, when the Generals resolved to try their fortune for eighteen days before the town, it was desired, that the fleet would furnish a certain number of men; and that the Prince of Hesse should procure a proportion of Miquelets; upon which, the Earl of Peterborough having signed this Council in the affirmative as General, wrote a letter to the Prince of Hesse, and sent Brigadier Stanhope to make a demand of men in behalf of the Land-Council of war from the flags; but, coming on board himself the same day, in regard to the safety of the fleet, his Lordship gave his opinion in writing as Admiral, directly contrary to his opinion and request as General; as appears from the Earl's letter to the Prince of Hesse of the 27th of August, and his opinion at a Council of war, of English and Dutch Flag Officers held on board the Britannia, Aug.

It was concluded therefore, that all the hopes of reducing Barcelona lay in the success of their design on that fort (1).

Two bodies were ordered to march secretly in the night of the 13th of September, N. S. and to move towards the other side of Barcelona, that the true design might not be suspected, for all the hopes of success lay in the secrecy of the march. The first body consisted of eight hundred, and both the Prince of Hesse and the Earl of Peterborough led them. The other body consisted of six hundred, who were to follow these at some distance, and were not to come above half way up the hill till some further order. Brigadier Stanhope led this body. They drew up with them some small field-pieces and mortars. They had taken a great compass, and had marched all night, and were much fatigued by the time, that they had gained the top of the hill, and three hundred of them, being commanded to another side of the fort, were separated from the rest, and, mistaking their way, fell into the hands of a body of men sent up from the town to reinforce the garrison in the fort. Before they were separated, the whole body had attacked the out-works, and carried them. But, while the Prince of Hesse was leading on his men, he received a shot in his body, upon which he fell; yet he would not be carried off, but continued too long in the place giving orders, and died in a few hours, much and justly lamented. The Governor of the fort, seeing a small body in possession of the out-works, resolved to fall upon them, and drew up four hundred men for that purpose. These would soon have mastered a small and wearied body, disheartened by so great a loss; so that, if he had followed his own resolution, all would have been lost; for all, that Brigadier Stanhope could have done, would have been to receive and bring off such as got to him; but one of those newly taken happening to cry out, O poor Prince of Hesse! the Governor, hearing this, called for him, and examined him; and when he learned, that both the Prince of Hesse and the Earl of Peterborough were with that body, he concluded, that the whole army was certainly coming up after them; and, reflecting on that, he thought it was not fit for him to expose his men, since he believed, that the body, which they were to attack, would be soon much superior to him; for which reason he resolved not to risque a sally, but to keep within, and maintain the fort against them. Thus the Earl of Peterborough continued quiet in the out-works, and, being reinforced with more men, he attacked the fort, but with no great hopes of succeeding, till, throwing a few bombs into it, one of them fell into the magazine of powder, and blew it up, by which the Governor, and some of the

Aug. 27, 1705. "Thus, says the Author of the Impartial Inquiry, p. 32, his Lordship having voted only conditionally as General for undertaking the siege of Barcelona, and having afterwards disagreed to the performance of that condition as Admiral, we may reasonably conclude he did not vote for undertaking the siege at all, and yet had a mind the experiment should be made at the hazard of the other Admirals, in his absence. But however contradictory these two opinions may appear, and however opposite they may have really been to his Catholic Majesty's interest; this is not the only instance his Lordship has given under his own hand, of the little inclination he had to contribute to the reduction of Catalonia, as will plainly appear by several original papers.—Now, as to what regards the King of Spain's resolution, I think that may easily be accounted for from the different temper of his two Generals, the Prince of Hesse continually advising his Majesty to press the siege; my Lord Peterborough as assiduous to make him lay aside all thoughts of it; as may be seen very evidently from the following letter to Sir Claude Shovel from the Prince of Hesse, dated at the camp, Sept. 8, 1705, wherein he writes thus: "His Catholic Majesty, being in the greatest trouble in the world to find my Lord Peterborough again resolved to leave this enterprize, hath his only recourse to you; his Majesty declaring, that, if his Lordship persists in his resolution to go away, his Majesty finding, that without reason his Crown and so good Subjects shall be sacrificed, is resolved to stay with them, happen what will. This I must acquaint you with, in hopes that you will never permit such a cruel abandoning, and to take your measures accordingly. The King begs it of you as the last favour, and intreats you, in the most submissive manner, to find out a way, that his Majesty may not be the sacrifice of fools and knaves."

(1) Dr. Friend, in his Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, p. 32, says, that his Lordship now made use only of his own thoughts, and by an uncommon artifice made that never to be forgotten attack upon Numb. XLVI. Vol. III.

on fort Montjuic, the very foundation of all our footing in Spain. This, I know, some would attribute to the late Prince of Hesse. That brave Prince indeed had too great a share in the danger of this undertaking; but, as he had no command in the army, so he was not in the least concerned in the forming of this design.—The injudicious, or rather impracticable proposals made by the Prince of Hesse, and insisted upon by him to the last, were the occasion of those unanimous Councils of war against an enterprize, which promised such certain ruin; and the freedoms taken in discourse by that Prince had prevented any correspondence for some time between him and the Earl of Peterborough. So far was this project against Montjuic from being proposed by that Prince to his Lordship, that in truth the Earl of Peterborough was forced to make it a secret even to the court, where resentments were very public and remarkable, upon the orders to embark the artillery and the King's baggage, which his Lordship gave out, the better to disguise his real design. Nay, the excuse the Earl of Peterborough made to the Prince of Hesse, for inviting him to assist in an action he could not yet acquaint him with, was, that the indispensable necessity of deceiving the enemy, had made him resolve to surprize his friends in an attempt, which, however desperate, was yet the only possible way of carrying on the siege with success.

On the other hand the Author of the Impartial Inquiry into the management of the war in Spain, p. 35, assures us, that the Earl's project, for that time at least, was of a quite different nature from that of the attack upon fort Montjuic; which he proves from the following original papers, viz. a letter from the Prince of Hesse to Sir Claude Shovel from the camp, September 10, 1705, in which are these words:

"I do not doubt Captain Norris hath given you an account of what happened yesterday. Notwithstanding, the King hath ordered me to acquaint you of all the particulars. Having found, that the Land-Officers were not to be reduced to consent to the attack upon this place, my Lord Peterborough hath been at last disposed to offer to the King, for an expedient, the march to Tarragona, and from

The Prince of Hesse d'Armstadt only was of opinion, that they ought to sit down before Barcelona, alledging, that he had secret intelligence of the good affections of many in the town, who were well known to him, and on whom he relied; and he undertook to answer for their success. This could not satisfy those, who knew nothing of his secrets, and consequently could only judge of things by what appeared to them. The debate lasted some hours: In conclusion the King himself spoke near half an hour; he resumed the whole debate; he answered all objections, that were made against the siege, and treated every one of those, who had made them, as he answered them, with particular civilities. He supported the truth of what the Prince of Hesse had asserted, as being known to himself. He said in the State, in which his affairs then stood, nothing could be proposed, that had not great difficulties in it: All was doubtful, and much must be put to hazard. But this seemed less dangerous than any other thing, that was proposed; many of his subjects had come and declared for him to the hazard of their lives; it became him therefore to let them see, that he would run the same hazard with them. He defired, that they would stay so long with him, till such attempts should be made, that nothing could be done; and he hoped, that, till then, they would not leave him. He added, that, if their orders obliged them to leave him, yet he could not leave his own subjects. Upon this, they resolved to sit down before Barcelona, being all amazed to see so young a Prince, so little practised in business, argue in so nice a point with so much force, and conclude with such heroic resolutions. This proved happy in many respects. It came to be known afterwards, that the Catalans and Miquelets, who had joined them, hearing, that they were resolved to sit down and go back to their ships, had resolved, either out of resentment, or that they might merit their pardon, to murder as many of them as they could. When this small army late down before Barcelona, they found they were too weak to besiege it, and could scarce mount their cannon. When they came to examine their stores, they found them very defective, and far short of the quantities, that by their lists they expected to find. It soon appeared, that the intelligence was true concerning the inclinations of those in the town: Their affections were intire to King Charles; but they were overawed by the garrison, and by Velasco, who, as well as the Duke of Popoli, who had the chief command, was devoted to the interests of King Philip. Deferters came daily from the town,

Iona, found the scene of affairs quite otherwise, than what he was promised he should meet with. Instead of ten thousand men in arms, to cover his landing, and strengthen his camp, he saw only so many hangers and fustlers flocking into it. Instead of a City in a weak Condition, and ready to surrender upon the appearance of his troops, he found an orderly garrison, and a force almost equal to his army. In these difficulties, his Lordship, as he was obliged by his instructions, called frequent Councils of war; wherein day after day, for above a fortnight together, it was often unanimously, and always by a Majority, agreed, that, considering the weakness of our forces, and the strength of the enemy; considering, that our batteries, as our Engineers declared, would be almost as long a raising on the side of the town we were masters of, as the fleet could well stay: In short, considering the extreme want of every thing necessary towards such an attempt, the siege was utterly impracticable. His Lordship did indeed twice give his vote for the undertaking; but from the councils of war it will appear, that it was only out of the extreme passion he had to comply with the King of Spain's desires, and not out of any confidence he had of succeeding. At the same time his Lordship proposed and offered to his Majesty, either to sail with the whole fleet to Italy, in order to support the Duke of Savoy; or to march by land along the sea-coast, where, with the countenance and assistance of the fleet, many towns of consequence might be reduced, the whole country disposed to declare for, and pay obedience to his Catholic Majesty, as some part of the neighbouring parts had done; and, upon any reasonable encouragement from Catalonia, and the Kingdoms of Valencia and Aragon, winter-quarters might be secured, and a body of troops raised out of them, which might enable his Majesty to march to Madrid next spring. But the Author of the Impartial Inquiry into the Management of the War in Spain, printed at London in 1712. in 8vo. observes, p. 27, that this extreme passion, which the Earl of Peterborough had to comply with the King of Spain's desires, did not last long, as appears from those very Councils of war, which are published by Dr. Friend; for in the first Council held on the 16th of August 1705. O. S. the siege of Barcelona was judged impracticable, nemine contradicente; on the 22d a particular attack upon the curtain was proposed, and the Earl the only person, who approved it; on the 25th a general attack was proposed for eighteen days, which was agreed to only by the Earl, and the Brigadiers, Stanhope and St. Amant; and on the 26th it was resolved by all the Generals, at the King of Spain's request, to try their fortune eighteen Days before the Town. But on the 28th another Council was held, wherein the Earl was as forward as any for embarking the troops again; and seems to have furnished the Generals with the reasons of that resolution; which is the more probable, because the reasons alledged in that Council were, that they had not been assisted either by the fleet, or the country people, as they expected; that the King was uncertain in his resolutions, sometimes for a march, sometimes for a siege; and that the Deputies of the Catalans had declared to his Lordship, that they would not promise any number of men to work in the trenches or batteries, or in any places where they should be exposed to fire. (1) Dr. Friend, in his Account of the Earl of Peterborough's Conduct in Spain, p. 32, says, that his Lordship now made use only of his own thoughts, and by an uncommon artifice made that never to be forgotten attack upon on fort Montjuic, the very foundation of all our footing in Spain. This, I know, some would attribute to the late Prince of Hesse. That brave Prince indeed had too great a share in the danger of this undertaking; but, as he had no command in the army, so he was not in the least concerned in the forming of this design.—The injudicious, or rather impracticable proposals made by the Prince of Hesse, and insisted upon by him to the last, were the occasion of these unanimous Councils of war against an enterprize, which promised such certain ruin; and the freedoms taken in discourse by that Prince had prevented any correspondence for some time between him and the Earl of Peterborough. 1705. best Officers were killed; and this struck the rest with such a consternation, that they delivered up the place.

This success was the more considerable, as the town of Barcelona lay just under the hill, on which the fort stood. Upon this, the party in Barcelona, that was well-affected to King Charles, began to resume their courage, and to shew themselves. Nor did the Earl of Peterborough lose any time in improving his advantages, for, as soon as Stanhope's brigade and some other troops were come up, he caused the trenches to be opened, and four batteries of cannon, and two of mortars, to be erected; in which service, both the Miquelets and the English and Dutch seamen were very useful. In the mean time, the bomb-vessels threw about four hundred shells into the town, which occasioned a great consternation among the people; and the batteries fired with so much success, that, on the 4th of October, N. S. Don Francisco de Velasco consented to capitulate; and Brigadier Stanhope was exchanged, with Count de Ribeira, as hostages. The Viceroy made several extravagant demands, the debating of which continued till the 9th, when it was agreed, that the garrison should march out with all the marks of honour, be transported by sea to St. Felix near Palamos, and conducted from thence to Gironne. But, upon advice, that Gironne had surrendered to King Charles III. it was agreed, that Velasco, with his garrison, should be transported to Roses, which, by this time, was the only place in Catalonia, that had not declared for the House of Austria. Thus was accomplished the conquest of the largest and richest Province of Spain, with an army scarce double the number of the garrison of Barcelona.

King Charles was received into that City with great expressions of joy. In the first transport, the people seemed resolved to break through the articles granted to the garrison, and to make sacrifices of the chief Officers at least. Upon that, the Earl of Peterborough, with Brigadier Stanhope and other Officers, rode about the streets, to stop this fury, and to prevail with the people to maintain their articles religiously; and, in doing this, they run a greater hazard from the shooting and fire, that was flying about in that disorder, than they had done during the whole siege. They at last quieted the people, and the articles of capitulation were punctually observed.

Brigadier Stanhope was soon after sent to England, to give a full relation of this great transaction; by whom King Charles wrote to the Queen a long and clear account of all his affairs, full of great acknowledgements of her assistance, with a high commendation of all her subjects, especially of the Earl of Peterborough. This letter was all written with the King's own hand, and the French of it was so little correct, that it was not like what a Secretary would have drawn for him, and therefore it was concluded, that it was penned by himself. The Lord-Treasurer had likewise another letter from him, all in his own hand; one correction in which seemed to make it evident, that the King composed it himself.

"thence to extend our quarters to Tortosa, and even into Valencia; which the King willingly accepted, as the only hopes left for him, that might conduct him to the Throne, seeing that nothing else could be done; so that this march is now fully resolved upon for next Monday or Thursday. The King, at the same time, desires of you to consider, that, his person staying in this Kingdom, if it would not be serviceable, that the fleet, or part of it, during our march, should make themselves masters of Majorca, or Minorca, and Porca, where no resistance can be made; and then to leave in the winter some squadron of light frigates in the Alfaques, and to secure Port Mahon with another; which place, you know, is large enough, so that ten years ago the whole Smyrna and Turky fleet came there to an anchor. Then his Majesty desires your opinion, before we leave this place, if it would not be convenient to throw some shells, and cannonade the place, where they build their galleys, and there to summon the town, and then to make some attack with boats and with ladders by the country-people, according to the answer the Governor shall give; all which I leave to your best consideration. His Catholic Majesty relies in every part on your good zeal, and particular love, you have shewn on all occasions to his person, and shall always owe to you the good success of this undertaking."

The next paper cited is the King of Spain's agreement to the expedient proposed to him by the Earl of Peterborough, dated at the camp September 16, N. S. 1705, in these words:

My Lord Earl of Peterborough,

"I accept the offer you make me, seeing, by the resolutions of the Councils of war, there remains nothing else to support me in Spain; so that, I assure you, I shall remain positive in the resolution of marching into the country, being what you may "take upon yourself, and justify it, because the Council of war had determined upon it. For the rest of the dispositions and particulars of the march, and of further designs to be formed, they will be easily regulated by you, and those persons, that I shall appoint to assist you on my part, reposing an intire trust in you, and the zeal you express to my service."

The Author of the Impartial Inquiry then takes notice of Dr. Friend's not allowing the Prince of Hesse any share in the design against Montjuic, because of the open misunderstanding at that time between that Prince and the Earl of Peterborough, who even concealed that design from the Court. "And yet, says the Author of the Impartial Inquiry, the Prince of Hesse went Volontier upon this project, which one would think he should hardly have done in those circumstances, had the thought been intirely my Lord Peterborough's, and kept a secret from his Highness till the execution. But to say nothing of the Prince's longer service and experience, and to pass over the improbability of his Lordship's having formed in so little a time as one night a happy project against a fort, which he could not possibly know so well as the Prince, that had been Viceroy of Catalonia in King Charles II'd time, and had defended Barcelona against the Duke of Vendôme; let us examine into the success of this attack, which was, that a party of grenadiers, supported by the Prince of Hesse, carried all before them, and made themselves masters of the out-works; but the taking of the Dungeon, which began to be despaired of, was afterwards intirely owing to the accidental firing of a bomb, that blew up the enemy's magazine of a powder, and frightened them into a surrender; which happy accident was the chief occasion of our taking Barcelona. For my part, I shall not pretend to determine, who has the best right to the glory of this project; but it is certain the Prince of Hesse was no stranger to it." The Author then 1705. himself (1). He wrote, towards the end of the letter, that he must depend on his protection: Upon reflection, that word seemed not fit for him to use to a subject, and therefore was dashed out, but the letters were still plain; and, instead of it, application was writ over it. These letters gave a great idea of so young and unexperienced a Prince, who was able to write with so much clearness, judgment, and force. Nor could he receive much assistance from the Prince of Lichtenstein, who was, by all accounts, a man of a low genius, who thought of nothing but the ways of enriching himself, even at the hazard of ruining his Master's business.

A Council of war being held at Barcelona, it was thought fit to comply with the King's resolution of venturing his own person with the Catalans; and that the Earl of Peterborough should continue with that Prince with the land-forces, and as many of the marines, as could be spared from the service of the ships: The season of the year being far spent, it was, at the same time, resolved, That Sir Cloudesly Shovel and Admiral Allemonde should return home immediately; that twenty-five English and fifteen Dutch men of war should winter at Lisbon, under the command of Sir John Leake and Rear-Admiral Wassenar; and that four English and two Dutch frigates should be left at Barcelona. The fleet sailed from thence a few days after; and Don Velasco, not thinking himself safe at Rosès, and having desired to be transported to Malaga, was landed there; with about a thousand men of the garrison of Barcelona. The rest having readily lifted themselves in the service of King Charles, a regiment of five hundred dragoons was formed out of them for his guard; and six other regiments were afterwards raised by the States of Catalonia.

While the well-affected Miquelets and Catalans; headed by the Count de Cifuentes, and assisted by the English and Dutch forces, secured themselves in the cities and towns of Tarragona, Tortosa, Lerida, San Mattheo, Gironne, and other places, Don Raphael Nebot, a Catalan, having quitted King Philip's service, came with his whole regiment of five hundred horse, and one hundred and fifty horse more, that joined him, to Denia, where being reinforced by Major-General Ramos, with part of the garrison, they made themselves masters of Xabea, Oliva, Gandia, and Alzira, in the Kingdom of Valencia. Flushed with these successes, they marched to the capital city with a thousand horse, five hundred foot, and a great number of the militia, and, by the assistance of some of the inhabitants, made themselves masters of that place, where they took the Marquis de Villa-Garcia, the Viceroy, and the Archbishop prisoners. Hereupon, the whole Kingdom, the towns of Alicant and Peniscola excepted, declared for King Charles III., who immediately raised Colonel Nebot to the post of a Major-General; and, a few days after, ap- Dec. 29, pointed the Count de Cifuentes Viceroy of Valencia, at which the Earl of Peterborough, who began to be jealous of that Count, was not a little disgusted.

In the first consultation about the war, after Campaign in Valencia, the taking of Barcelona, the Earl of Peterborough was Friend.

gives several letters to Sir Cloudesly Shovel from that Prince, who, in that of the 8th of September, N. S. writes thus:

"As his Catholic Majesty has heard nothing of my Lord Peterborough's talking again of a sudden embarking, he hopes it will not be so; and desires me to tell you, that, if it could be done, being the resolutions of the Council of war, to land as soon as possible all the guns, and every thing necessary to hinder any resolution to be taken to the contrary."

In another, dated September 9, N. S. the Prince writes thus:

"Since the Land-officers are so disposed now to depart from their last resolution, and the King finding himself obliged in honour and in conscience not to abandon so good subjects, who have demonstrated to him all the zeal imaginable, more than the two thirds of the country having put themselves under the obedience of their lawful King, so that he can by no means leave them to their utmost ruin, as his Majesty has signified to-day to my Lord Peterborough, desiring of him some expedient, and being very willing to follow his advice; I believe the only way, which is left, is, that my Lord may be disposed to follow the resolutions taken by a Council of war for a march, as you are informed without doubt, such as has been taken to make ourselves masters of Tarragona, to keep the Dutch with us, and then to extend our winter-quarters to Tortosa, and even into Valencia, as occasion shall permit. This his Majesty desires of you, to interpose with his Lordship to come to a determination how far he can assist his Majesty in this; which favour his Majesty will esteem as the most particular and only expedient left to preserve some hopes of being put into the possession of the Crown of Spain."

In his letter, of the 13th of September, N. S. the Prince writes thus:

"I heard just now, that Captain Cavendish is to sail immediately, according as the King of Spain desired, as you have writ to the Earl of Peterborough. But I having not been with the King to-day, and some particular service being resolved [the attack on Montjuic] as Captain Norris will tell you, when he comes back, I take the liberty to desire of you the favour, if possible, to stop Captain Cavendish's proceeding till to-morrow morning. Captain Norris will inform you more at large about the matter in question. My Lord Peterborough desires me to write these lines, and hopes, that this night's business will make us all easy."

The Author of the Impartial Inquiry then gives us two letters of Sir Cloudesly Shovel, which not only contain an exact journal of the siege, but likewise shew; that something was due in the reduction of Catalonia to the good disposition of the people, and a great deal to the assistance of the fleet.

Mr. Boyer, in his History of Queen Anne, p. 203. asserts, That it was the Prince of Hesse, who proposed to the Earl of Peterborough the scheme of surprizing the fort of Montjuic, and desired, that his Lordship would give him only a thousand men for that purpose, offering himself to conduct and command them; and that the Earl having taken a view of that fort, and of the town on that side, and maturely weighed his Highness's reasons, and considered the manner, in which he intended to proceed in the attack, not only concurred with the Prince, and readily granted him the thousand men he desired, but likewise resolved to support his Highness himself with a thousand men more, and some dragoons.

(1) Dr.

1705. was of opinion, that the forces should be divided, and the better half march immediately into Valencia, the rest into Aragon. The English and Dutch Major-Generals, Cunningham and Schraatenbach, were against fatiguing and diminishing the troops; which they thought must be preserved with the utmost care, since they were hardly sufficient to defend the places already possessed in Catalonia. The latter opinion prevailed; and rest could hardly be refused to troops, which had undergone such hardships at sea, and the fatigues of such a siege. However, the Earl of Peterborough obtained an universal consent to send a good body to Lerida, and about one thousand foot and two hundred horse to Tortosa, the bordering city on the Kingdom of Valencia. With this small force he impatiently pressed for marching into Valencia; but there were some at Court, who were better pleased, that the reduction of that Kingdom should be procured by their correspondence and management, than that it should be owing to her Majesty's arms. In the mean time, the city of Valencia was brought to declare for the House of Austria; but the rejoicings upon this occasion were of short continuance, and the divisions at the Court of Barcelona gave the enemy time to bring a body of three thousand horse and as many foot into the Kingdom of Valencia, under the command of the Conde de las Torres, a General of known courage and of long service, who laid siege to St. Mattheo, where Colonel Jones commanded some hundreds of miquelets. This place being of so great importance by its situation, in regard that all communication between Catalonia and Valencia must have been cut off, had it fallen into the enemy's hands, the news of its being besieged gave great alarms to the Court. However, upon a report, that the country people of Catalonia, Valencia, and Aragon had taken up arms, to the number of sixteen thousand men; that they had surrounded Count Tilly, who had with him one thousand horse and one thousand foot; and that there was nothing wanting to the entire destruction of those troops before St. Mattheo, but a few Officers, and some of the disciplined troops, that were in Tortosa, to encourage and direct this multitude, so conveniently posted, the King ordered the Dec. 31, Earl of Peterborough to give speedy directions N. S. in it. The Earl regretted the lost time too much to lose one moment more; and, instead of sending to a Subaltern the orders required, he immediately went post to Tortosa; and, though St. Mattheo was above thirty leagues from Barcelona, in about eight days from his departure, he found ways to raise that siege, though the report of the country's being up in arms was not true, and though he had nothing to depend upon but one thousand foot and two hundred dragoons. The methods taken in effecting this were as much out of the common road, as the resolution to attempt it (1).

After the raising of the siege of St. Mattheo, the Earl of Peterborough resolved to make a shew of pursuing the enemy, without entirely exposing his little body, if they should be better informed, and lay aside their panic fear; and therefore, while they marched through a narrow plain leading to Valencia, the Earl took along the edge of the hill, to a place called Albacazor. Here he received an express from the King, with the

(1) Dr. Friend gives a particular account of this affair, and says, p. 206, that the enemy was before St. Mattheo with between two thousand three hundred horse, and about four thousand foot, whereas his Lordship had nothing to depend upon but one thousand foot and two hundred dragoons. It is not hard to guess what the general opinion was in these circumstances; neither did his Lordship endeavour to persuade the Officers, that it was reasonable to approach such numbers with so inconsiderable force, but only made them sensible, that, unless he could raise that siege, their affairs were desperate, and therefore only capable of desperate remedies. Upon which, he desired his Officers to be content to let him try his fortune, whether he could not by diligence and surprize effect that, which by downright force was utterly impracticable. The confidence, which these Gentlemen had in the Earl's care and intelligence, made them on all occasions approve of, or acquiesce at least in his designs, whatever difficulties might seem to lie in the way. It is certain, the Conde de las Torres had not the least notice of any enemy, till those employed by the Earl of Peterborough gave him the account; which was in such a manner contrived by his Lordship, and performed by his spies, that it obtained the desired effect. His Lordship never made use of any Spaniards, without getting the whole family in his possession, to be answerable for those he employed; and, as the people of that country have very good natural parts, and will run any hazards for money, it was hard for the General of the other side to avoid being imposed upon, without renouncing all intelligence, and refusing credit to every thing, though never so probable.

By marches in the mountains, by dividing his troops, and by the help of obscurity, his Lordship brought all his men to meet in one night at a place called Tragueira, within six miles of the enemy's camp; and there, having got them within the walls, by his diligence and care he prevented any person from going out of town to give the enemy intelligence. He began his march before day, and, having with a small party viewed the woods and hills, he placed a few dragoons and miquelets so conveniently, that they could not be seen but by those they had already passed by, which his Lordship took care to secure; so that all the soldiers were brought to their respective posts, to appear at an hour prefixed, soon after his Lordship's spies had made the intended impression on the enemy's army. What this stratagem was, and what influence it was designed to have upon the enemy, will be best conceived from this letter, which his Lordship wrote to Colonel Jones, who was then Governor of St. Mattheo.

"You will hardly believe yourself what this letter informs you of, if it comes safe to you; and, though I have taken the best precautions, it will do little prejudice, if it falls into the enemies hands, since they shall see and feel the troops, as soon almost as they can receive intelligence, should it be betrayed to them. The end, for which I venture it to you, is, that you may prepare to open the furthest gate towards Valencia, and have your thousand miquelets ready, who will have the employment they love and are fit for, the following and pillaging a flying enemy. The country is as one could wish for their entire destruction. Be sure, upon the first appearance of our troops, and the first discharge of our artillery, you answer with an English halloo, and take to the mountains on the right with all your men. It is no matter what becomes of the town; leave it to your mistresses. The Conde de las Torres must take the plains, the hills on the left being almost impassable, and secured by five or six thousand of the country-people. But what will most gail them, the old regiment of Nebot, which revolted to us near Valencia, is likewise among them.

"I was

1705. the melancholy account, "That the Duke of Noailles was entering, with near eight thousand men, in Catalonia, from the side of Rouffillon: That the body under Prince Tercles Tilly in Aragon was four or five thousand, pressing upon all the places near Lerida: That the Duke of Anjou, with Marshal de Theſſe, was forming a body of ten thousand men near Madrid, which would soon be in motion; besides the troops under the Duke of Berwick on the side of Portugal." After these informations, the King acquainted him, that he was obliged to countermand the one thousand foot, and three hundred horse, which were appointed to join him, and were already come almost as far as Tortosa. The letters from Court at the same time represented the necessity of defending Catalonia, and, above all, the care and preservation of the King's person; but, however, in this matter the Earl had no positive orders from the King. In these circumstances, he advised with his Officers, who were unanimously of opinion, that all endeavours ought to be used for the speedy defence of Catalonia. The Earl so far complied with the Council of war, as to give orders to the foot, with a small party of horse, to march back to Vinaces, six leagues from Tortosa, where, in case of necessity, he could embark the foot in boats, and throw them securely into the Ebro; but being fully resolved never to repass that river, without positive orders from the King, he set out with a party of horse to pursue the enemy. The Earl expressed himself very freely upon that subject, in a letter he wrote from Alcala to the King, wherein he told him, "That, if his Majesty would have believed him, he probably had not only had, at this time, a Viceroy of Valencia, but the Kingdom!" Concluding; "That, if the time lost exposed him to a sacrifice, at least he would perish with honour, and as a man deserving a better fate." At the same time, the Earl sent orders to the thousand Spanish foot and three hundred horse, to enter into Valencia; and, in case the King should again remand them to Lerida, he had sent positive orders for Colonel Wills to march immediately with an equal number of horse and foot to his assistance. This resolution produced the desired effect; and orders were sent from the Court at Barcelona to the Spanish forces, to follow the direction of the English General. Hereupon the Earl of Peterborough continued the pursuit of the enemy, who retired from him with the same precipitation as they had fled from St. Mattheo, being still, by the same artifices (used to make them raise the siege) persuaded, that they were followed by considerable forces. After several days march, the Earl possessed himself of Nules, where he began to form that cavalry, which secured the Kingdom of Valencia, and afterwards contributed to save Barcelona; taking near two hundred horse in a place, where the enemy had three thousand men the day before. After this, he

"I was eight days ago myself in Barcelona, and I believe, the Comde de las Torres must have good intelligence from thence, that he cannot be ignorant of it. What belongs to my own troops, and my own resolutions, I can easily keep from him, though nothing else. You know the force I have, and the multitudes, that are gathering from all parts against us; so that I am forced to put the whole upon this action; which must be decisive, to give any hopes to our desperate game.

"By nine or ten, within an hour after you can receive this, assure yourself, you will discover us on the tops of the hills, not two cannon-shot from the camp.

"The advantages of the sea are inconceivable, and have contributed to bring about, what you could never expect to see, a force almost equal to the enemy in number; and you know less would do our business. Besides, never men were so transported, to be brought with such secrecy so near an enemy. I have near six thousand men locked up this night within the walls of Fraguera; I do not expect you should believe it, till you see them.

"You know we had a thousand foot and two hundred dragoons in Tortosa. Wills, and a thousand foot, English and Dutch, came down the Ebro in boats; and I embarked a thousand foot more at Tarragona, which I landed at Vinaces; and the artillery from thence I brought in country carts. It was easy to assemble the horse. Zinzendorf and Moras are as good as our own, and with our English dragoons make in all near two thousand. But the whole depends upon leaving them to retreat without interruption.

"Dear Jones, prove a good dragoon: Be diligent and alert; and preach that welcome doctrine to your miquelets, Plunder without danger."

Your Friend,

PETERBOROUGH.

This letter was given to two several persons; the one intrusted and ordered, by such an hour in the No. 46. Vol. III.

morning, to pretend the betraying of it into the hands of the Comde de las Torres; the other was to remain hid in the mountains, and agreed with to endeavour to give it in the night to Colonel Jones. This man was really persuaded, that the number of troops was as considerable as was pretended. The first was ordered to say nothing of the Earl of Peterborough's force, lest he might be exposed to ill usage, when the truth came to be discovered. When he had given the letter, he had directions to inform, where the other spy was hid, upon condition made for the security of his life. Whether the artificial account of the one, or the sincere confession of the other prevailed, is not known; but it is certain, that, as soon as the letter was translated, orders were given to prepare for a march; and, not long after, when, upon a retreat of a small part of the enemy, some of the Earl's men approached the top of the hill, which overlooks St. Mattheo, the whole army was in the utmost confusion, the soldiers striking their tents, loading their baggage, and preparing to quit the siege.

In a very little time the troops of the Earl of Peterborough appeared on the top of the adjoining mountain, not above random cannon-shot from some part of the enemies camp. The country, which was full of little rising grounds and vallies, and covered with olive-trees, being favourable for such an approach, and the enemies advanced party being drawn into the camp, before any judgment could be formed of the Earl's strength, it was easy for him to make a shew of his forces to advantage. This surprize made their fears as great as could be desired; and, had the Earl had any proportion of troops, he had a fair opportunity of cutting them all off. But he was content to let seven thousand men go off without being attacked, and thought it enough to raise the siege with a force so disproportionate as that of one thousand two hundred; after his Lordship found, not only all the informations, which engaged him in that attempt, entirely wrong, but his circumstances so very difficult, as would have deterred any other man from so hazardous an undertaking.

1705 he came to Castillon de la Plana, a town populous, rich, and well-affected, where having procured and bought eight hundred horses, he not only recruited the dismounted English and Spanish dragoons, but formed a new regiment of dragoons out of part of the Lord Barrimore's regiment of foot; the command of which new corps he gave to Lieutenant-Colonel Pierce, ordering the remaining Officers of the old to return to England, to recruit the same. Having drawn together ten squadrons of horse and dragoons, and four battalions of foot, regular forces, besides about three thousand militia, he marched to Molviedro, the ancient Saguntum, so famous in the Roman History, four leagues distant from Valencia, where Brigadier Maboni, an Irish Officer, had, under his command about eight hundred men, near half of whom were his own regiment of dragoons. The town and castle were an old fortification, secured by a river, which the Earl of Peterborough was to pass, and so were capable of making some resistance. But, Brigadier Maboni having consented to an interview with the Earl, the latter made so advantageous a show of his strength, that Maboni was at last induced to surrender the town, being allowed to withdraw his troops. At the same time, the Earl of Peterborough so dexterously raised jealousies of Maboni in several of the Spanish Officers, and in the Duke of Arco, who had succeeded the Conde de las Torres, that he met with no disturbance in his march, through the plain from Molviedro to Valencia, where he was received with extraordinary demonstrations of joy. Whole bodies of Priests and Friars, in their several habits, were regimented and drawn up under arms to attend him, publicly acknowledging, that they owed their preservation to his resolution and activity (1).

An action
at St. Itevan de Litera.

About this time, a considerable action happened near St. Itevan de Litera. Major-General Connyngbam, who was lately made Lieutenant-General, and commanded in Lerida, with a strong garrison of English and Dutch, having intelligence, that the enemy about Balbastro designed to attack some of his dragoons at Tamarite, he immediately sent thither Colonel Wills with six hundred men; upon which the enemy repassed the river, and retired to Balbastro. Three days after, the Chevalier d'Asfeld, with nine squadrons of horse and dragoons, and as many battalions of foot, all French, advanced to attack Colonel Wills, who, the day before, had marched to St. Itevan de Litera, with no more than four hundred foot and thirty dragoons. Upon the enemy's approach, Colonel Wills drew out his small number, and attacked their advanced guard so briskly, that he beat them back to their body, and, pursuing them a league, obliged them to retire in confusion to Fons and Almana. At night, Colonel Wills was joined by Connyngbam and Colonel Palm, with the rest of the troops, to the number in all of between eleven and twelve hundred men. The next morning, the Chevalier d'Asfeld advanced with his troops to attack the Confederates, who thereupon drew out, and posted their foot on a hill, toward which the enemy's foot was marching. About eight o'clock they were fully engaged, and the enemy pushed two companies of English grenadiers; but Major Buſson marched up with some platoons, and beat them back again; at which time, Connyngbam received a shot through his belly, and was carried off. Colonel Wills, having then the command, continued the fight till three in the afternoon; but, tho' the enemy employed a great part of their forces to drive the Confederates from the hill, yet they kept their ground with so much resolution, that the enemy thought fit to retreat again to Fons and Almana. The troops fought with extraordinary bravery on both sides, so that the muzzles of their pieces met. The Confederates had several Officers, and about one hundred and fifty

(1) Dr. Friend observes, p. 268. That his Lordship had, as his Officers conceived, two insuperable difficulties; the one to get possession of Molviedro, and secure the pass on the river; the other, to pass the two leagues of the plains, which were betwixt Molviedro and Valencia, before so good and so strong a body of horse as that commanded by Maboni. His Lordship was in hopes, if he succeeded in one, to compass the other; and, to that end, as soon as he found the treaty with Maboni in a fair way, he chose two Irish dragoons out of Zinzendorf's regiment, which he well instructed and well paid, and sent immediately as Deserters to the Duke of Arco. He promised to make them Officers, if they succeeded; which was punctually made good to one, who well had deserved it, the other dying soon after his return. They were to discover to the Duke of Arco, that being hid under the rocks of the hill, where they were drinking a glass of wine, they had heard all the discourse between the Earl and Maboni: That they saw five thousand pistols delivered; and that Maboni was to be a Major-General, upon the English and Spanish establishment, and to command a body of ten thousand Irish Catholics, which were raising for the service of King Charles. They agreed with the Duke of Arco to have no reward, if he were not soon made sensible of the truth of what they said, by Maboni himself; since they were persuaded, that he would soon send to engage the Duke of Arco to march immediately with the whole army towards the Carthusian convent, under pretence of joining with his horse, in order to prevent the Earl of Peterborough from passing the plains of Molviedro; but that, whereas this march must be made in the night, all matters were so agreed and contrived betwixt the Earl and Maboni, and the troops so placed, that he must fall into the ambushes designed, and run great hazards of an intire defeat. It fell out, that, soon after those spies had given this account to the Duke of Arco, Maboni's Aid-de-camp arrived with proposals exactly to the same purpose. The Spanish General (whose suspicions were confirmed by the jealousies, which the Earl of Peterborough had raised in several of the Spanish Officers, who were come from Molviedro to him) instead of complying with the immediate march proposed by Maboni, removed his camp quite the contrary way. Maboni with his horse exposed the whole army at the Carthusian convent, till the approach of the Earl of Peterborough made him retire to the Duke of Arco's camp; and as soon as he arrived, he was secured by that General, and sent to Madrid. But, when Maboni came to tell his story at Court, he was made a Major-General, and the Duke of Arco was recalled.

The Author of the Impartial Inquiry into the management of the war in Spain, having quoted this story from Dr. Friend, observes, p. 79. "That it was not thus the Romans got possession of Molviedro, when it bore the name of Saguntum: They would not have rendered an enemy's General suspected to his master by arts unwarrantable, nor did they ever interpret in so loose a sense, Delus an virtus quis in heſie requirit?"

1705. fifty private men killed or wounded, but had no prisoners taken from them; whereas the enemy had four hundred men killed, and left behind them a Lieutenant-Colonel, and a Lieutenant of dragoons, who were made prisoners. Colonel Wills continued till five on the field of battle, and then marched to Belaguer, where Lieutenant-General Connyngbam died, three days after, of his wounds.

The Councils of Portugal.
Burnet.

Upon the news of the success in Catalonia, the Councils of Portugal were quite changed. That Court had a better prospect than formerly of the reduction of Spain. The war was now divided, which lay wholly upon them before; and the French party there had no longer the old pretence to excuse their counsels by, that it was not fit for them to engage themselves too deep in that war, nor to provoke the Spaniards too much, and expose themselves to revenge, if the Allies should despair and grow weary of the war, and recall their troops and fleets. But now, that they saw the war carried on so far in the remotest corner of Spain, which must give a great diversion to King Philip's forces, it seemed a much sfer, as well as it was an easier thing, to carry on the war with more vigour for the future. Upon this, all possible assurances were given the Earl of Galway, that things should be conducted hereafter fully to his satisfaction; so that by his dispatches to England it appeared, that he was thoroughly convinced of the sincerity of their intentions, of which he had been in great doubt, or rather despair.

Affairs at sea. Our affairs at sea were more prosperous this year than they had been formerly. In the beginning of the season, our Cruisers took so many of the French Privateers, that we had some thousands of their seamen in our hands; and we kept such a squadron before Brest, that the French fleet did not think fit to venture out; and their Toulon squadron had suffered so much in the action of the former years, that they either could not or would not venture out. By this means our navigation was safe, and our trade prosperous.

Affairs in Hungary. In Hungary matters went on very doubtfully. Transylvania was almost intirely ruined. Ragotski had great misfortunes there, as the Court of Vienna published the progress of the new Emperor's arms; but this was not to be much depended upon. They could not conceal, on the other hand, the great ravages which the malecontents made in other places; so that Hungary continued to be a scene of confusion and plunder.

and in
Poland. Poland was in no better condition. King Augustus's party continued firm to him, though his long stay in Saxony gave credit to a report spread about, that he was resolved to abandon that Kingdom, and to return to it no more. This summer past over in motions and actions of no great consequence: What was gained in one place, was lost in another. Stanislaus procured himself to be crowned. The old Cardinal, though summoned to Rome, would not go thither. He suffered himself to be forced to own Stanislaus, but died before his Coronation; and that ceremony was performed by the Bishop of Cujavia. The Muscovites made as great ravages in Lithuania, as they had formerly done in Livonia.

The King of Sweden was in perpetual motion; but, though he endeavoured it much, he could not bring things to a decisive action. In the beginning of winter, King Augustus, with two persons only, broke through Poland in disguise, and got away to the Muscovite army, which was put under his command. The campaign went on all the winter-season, which, considering the extreme cold in those parts, was thought a thing impracticable before. In the spring after, Reinschild, a Swedish General, fell upon the Saxon army, which was far superior to his in number; for he had not above ten thousand men, whereas the Saxons were about eighteen thousand; notwithstanding which, he gave them a total defeat, killed about seven thousand, and took eight thousand prisoners, and their camp, baggage, and artillery. Numbers, upon such occasions, are often swelled, but it is certain, this was an intire victory. The Swedes gave it out, that they had not lost a thousand men in the action; and yet even this great advantage was not like to put an end to the war, nor to the distractions, into which that miserable Kingdom was cast. In it the world saw the mischiefs of an elective Government, especially when the Electors have lost their virtue, and set themselves to sale. The King of Sweden continued in an obstinate aversion to all terms of peace; his temper, courage, and his military conduct, were much commended; but he grew too savage, and was so positive and peremptory in his resolutions, that no applications could soften him, and he would scarce admit them to be made. He was devout almost to enthusiasm; and he was severely engaged in the Lutheran rigidity, almost equally against Papists and Calvinists; but his education was so much neglected, that he had not an equal measure of knowledge to direct his zeal.

Having given such a view of the state of A Parliament Europe this summer, as may serve to shew the proceedings in every part of it, we shall now return to England. The election of the Members of the House of Commons was managed with zeal and industry on both sides. The Clergy took great pains to infuse into all people tragical apprehensions of the danger the Church was in. The Universities were inflamed with this, and took all possible means to spread it over the Nation with much vehemence. The danger of the Church of England grew to be the word as given in an army. Men were known as they answered it. None carried this higher than the Jacobites, though they had made a Schism in the Church. At last, even the Papists, both at home and abroad, seemed to be disturbed with the fears which the danger of our Church put them under; and this was supported by the Paris Gazette, though of that party seemed ashamed. Books were writ and dispersed over the Nation with great industry, to possess all people with the apprehensions that the Church was to be given up, that the Bishops were betraying it, and that the Court would sell it to the Dissenters. Now it was, that the memorial of the Church of England, penned by some zealous Churchmen, was printed and spread abroad, setting forth her melancholy situation and distress (1). They also hoped, that this campaign,

(1) This pamphlet was composed by Dr. Drake the physician, and others, and humbly offered to the consideration

1705. campaign, proving less prosperous than had been expected, might put the Nation into ill humour, which might furnish them with some advantages. In opposition to all this, the Court acted with such caution and coldness, that the Whigs had very little strength given them by the Ministers in managing the elections. They seemed rather to look on as indifferent Spectators, but the Whigs exerted themselves with great activity and zeal. The Dissenters, who had been formerly much divided, were now united intirely in the interests of the Government, and joined with the Whigs every where.

Sir Nathan Wright dismissed.

When the elections were all over, the Court took more heart, for it appeared, that they were sure of a great majority; and the Lord Godolphin declared himself more openly, than he had yet done, in favour of the Whigs. The first instance given of this, was the dismissing of Sir Nathan Wright, who had continued so long Lord-Keeper, that he was fallen under a high degree of contempt with all sides; even the Tories, though he was wholly theirs, despising him. He was fordidly covetous, and did not at all live suitably to that high post. He was become extremely rich, though he was not charged with bribery in his Court; but there was a rumour with relation to the livings of the Crown, that were given by the Great-Seal, as if they were set to sale by the Officers under him. The Great-Seal being sent for, the custody of it was given, in Council, to William Cowper, with the title of Lord-Keeper. He was a Gentleman of a good family, of excellent parts, and of an engaging deportment, very eminent in his profession, and had been, for many years, considered as the man, who spoke the best in the House of Commons. His promotion was very acceptable to the Whigs, who had been much disgusted with the Lord-Treasurer for the coldness he expressed, as if he would have maintained a neutrality between the two parties, though the one supported him, while the other designed to ruin him. But this step, in preferring the new consideration of all true lovers of our Church and Constitution. In it was the following passage: "Those, that look no deeper than the surface of things, are apt to conclude, without hesitation, that the Church of England is in a very flourishing condition. Its dignities and preferments make a very good shew, and the patronage of the Queen seems to promise a continuance of prosperity. But, for all this fine complexion and fair weather, there is an hectic fever lurking in the very bowels of it, which, if not timely cured, will infect all the humours, and at length destroy the very being of it. The Nation has a long time abounded with Sectaries, who, in the preceding century, violently overturned both Church and State, though their own extravagance and confusions, through a special providence, contributed more than human wisdom to the re-establishment of them. The sons of those men yet remain, and inherit, many of them, the principles of their fathers. It would therefore be no very uncharitable supposition, without any other argument, to imagine them heirs of their designs likewise; for it is easy to demonstrate, that such principles lead naturally to such designs, and that no man can heartily embrace one, without having favourable thoughts of the other. Nor can we blame them; for, if any man is persuaded (as many of our Sectaries avow themselves to be) that the discipline and worship of the Church of England are an abomination, his conscience will readily suggest to him, that he ought to do his utmost to purge the land from such abomination; and upon this pretence has the Church been once already subverted, though raised again by God in a miraculous manner. In those days a thorough Reformation, root and branch, was the cry of all the pulpits, the Slibboleth of the party. If, since the Church recovered its ancient lustre and authority, they have been more silent, and in appearance more moderate, it is not that they are better tempered or affected, but that, submitting to the necessity of the times, they have dissembled their intentions better: Yet some over-attempts here, and the whole course of their proceedings in Scotland during these two last Reigns, sufficiently shew us what treatment we might expect, if they had the power. But these people, though they may have the will, have not the power alone to endanger the Church. The Dissenters are not yet considerable enough for their numbers (however they boast of them) wealth, or quality, to bring about any great change in the constitution of Church or State. And our Church is too strong to be shaken, but through the treachery or supine negligence of its own Members, or those,

"at least, that pretend to be such; and, as such, palm themselves frequently upon their Country and Church, to the irreparable damage of both. The sudden death of the late King disappointed, mortified, and humbled the Dissenters and their Abettors, the Whigs, so excessively, that they were ready to have thrown a blank to the Church, and would have taken a general indemnity, with an exclusion from all public trust and office. They, who not a month before, breathed nothing but defiance, and insulted the Church, and treated the Princess with the most scandalous indignities and rudest calumnies, were in an instant grown the most dutiful subjects, the most affectionate friends, and the most peaceable, meek, Christian-spirited people in the universe. They preached nothing but charity, peace, and love, forgiveness of injuries, oblivion of wrongs, and the utter abolition and extinction of parties and factions for ever. So very good and gracious can men in fear be! But whence this humility and dejection of mind, this sweetness of temper? Was it natural, or the result of more extraordinary grace, or more Christian principles than other men were possessed of? No; but they had just before injured and affronted the Princess and Church of England in so insolent and outrageous a manner, upon presumption, that durable schemes were upon the anvil in their favour, that their own consciences, upon the vanishing of them, prompted them to seek pardon and peace, from those whom they had so abused, by an extraordinary submission. But when, contrary to these fears, they found the head of the Church, and, after her example, the Members of it too, inclined not only to forgive, but to forget past injuries, and that, instead of punishment, they met not with so much as a rebuke or reproach, but comfortable speeches and kind assurances from the Queen herself, and good countenance from some of her Prime Ministers, their spirits were elated in an instant; the spirit of humility and pacification vanished; their former insolence and presumption claimed upon them in full force; and they began to challenge and provoke the Church as boldly as ever. Thus far the history of their carriage towards the Church is public and recent, as likewise the advances, that have been made in their favour, and the repulses, which the Church has met with. Every thing has passed in Scotland to the desire of the Presbytery, even to the endangering the Church and Monarchy, of the Church, and the dishonour of its Crown, and the immediate prejudice of its Sovereignty; but, on the contrary, nothing for the security of the Church here, which cannot only boast itself to be a main branch of the Civil Constitution, 1705. new Lord-Keeper, went a great way towards reconciling the Whigs to him (1).

The new Parliament met on the 25th of October. The appearance in the House of Commons was greater than had been known at the opening of any Parliament for fifty years before; no less than four hundred and fifty-six Members being present. The first struggle was about the choice of a Speaker, by which a judgment was to be made of the temper and inclination of the Members. The Court declared for Mr. John Smith, a man of clear parts, and of a good expression, who was then in no employment, but had gone through great posts in the former Reign with reputation and honour, having been a Commissioner of the Treasury, and Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had, from his first setting out in the world, been thoroughly in the principles and interests of the Whigs, yet with a due temper in all personal things, with relation to the Tories. But the Tories all declared against him for Mr. Bromley, one of the Representatives of the University of Oxford, a man of a grave deportment and good morals, but considered as a violent Tory, and as a great favourer of Jacobites, which appeared evidently in a relation, which he printed of his travels. The Marquis of Granby, eldest son to the Duke of Rutland, who first proposed Mr. Smith, was seconded by Mr. Robert Walpole; and Sir John Holland, the Marquis of Hartington, Sir William Strickland, Sir Charles Turner, and some others spoke by turns on the same side. On the other hand, the Earl of Disert recommended Mr. Bromley, and was supported by Sir Thomas Hanmer, Sir Edward Seymour, Sir William Drake, Mr. Frederick Herne, Mr. Amelley, and Sir Roger Molyneux. No affair of that sort had ever been carried with such heat on both sides as this was: So that it was just to form a judgment upon it of the temper of the House. After a debate of about an hour and half, the House divided, and, two Members being appointed to tell the voices, Mr. Smith had two hundred and forty-eight, and Mr. Bromley two hundred and five only. Mr. Smith being, on the 27th of October, presented to the Queen, seated on the Throne in the House of Peers, she approved the choice of him, and made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Have been very desirous to meet you as early as I thought you might be called together without inconvenience to yourselves. And it is with much satisfaction, I observe so full an appearance at the opening of the Parliament, because it is a ground for me to conclude, you are all convinced of the necessity of prosecuting the just war, in which we are engaged, and therefore are truly sensible, that it is of the greatest importance to us, to be timely in our preparations.

"Nothing can be more evident, than that if the French King continues Master of the Spanish Monarchy, the balance of power in Europe is utterly destroyed, and he will be able, in a short time, to ingross the trade and the wealth of the world.

"No good Englishman could at any time be content to sit still, and acquiesce in such a prospect; and at this time we have great grounds to hope, that by the blessing of God upon our arms, and those of our Allies, a good foundation is laid for restoring the Monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria; the consequences of which will not only be safe and advantageous, but glorious for England.

"I may add, we have learned by our own experience, that no peace with France will last longer, than the first opportunity of their dividing the Allies, and of attacking some of them with advantage.

"All our Allies must needs be so sensible this is the true state of the case, that I make no doubt but measures will soon be so concerted, as that, if we be not wanting to ourselves, we shall see the next campaign begin offensively on all sides against our enemies, in a most vigorous manner.

"I must therefore desire you, Gentlemen of the

"stitution, but the prop and support of the whole frame of Government; which removed, it must necessarily fall to the ground, as has been once fatally experimented. All attempts to settle it on a perpetual foundation have been opposed and rendered ineffectual by Ministers, who owe their present grandeur to its protection; and who, with a prevarication as shameful as their ingratitude, pretend to vote and speak for it themselves, while they solicit and bribe others with pensions and places to be against it."

This last reflection was visibly levelled against the Duke of Marlborough and the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin; and the rest of that libel, containing no less injurious insinuations against the Queen herself for removing some of her Ministers, the Grand Jury of London and County of Middlesex, at the Sessions held at the Old-Bailey, on the 31st of August, "with the utmost indignation and resentment, presented one book, lately printed by a notorious criminal [David Edwards] (convicted in that Court for printing and publishing a seditious and treasonable libel, for which he was fined and pilloried, and was now fled from justice) intitled, The Memorial of the Church of England, &c. to be a false, scandalous, and traitorous libel, secretly, but industriously spread abroad, to advance and accomplish traitorous and wicked designs, highly impeaching the truth and sincerity of her Majesty's Royal resolution and pious assurances to support and preserve our Government, both in Church and State, the rights, liberties, and properties of all her people; and also craftily designed to reproach and scandalize her wife and faithful Ministry, divide her Councils, create variances, disputes, and discords in her Parliament, and to raise and foment animosities, fears, and jealousies amongst all her people." Upon this presentment the Court ordered the said libel to be forthwith burnt in the sight of the said Court then sitting, and also, on the Tuesday following, before the Royal Exchange; which was done accordingly, on the 1st of September, the Sheriffs attending.

(1) The Duchess of Marlborough, in the account of her conduct (p. 159.) says, The next year I prevailed with her Majesty to take the Great-Seal from Sir Nathan Wright, a man despised by all parties, of no use to the Crown, and whose weak and wretched conduct, in the Court of Chancery, had almost brought his very office into contempt. His removal, however, was a great loss to the Church, for which he had ever been a warm stickler. And this loss was the more sensibly felt, as his Successor, my Lord Cowper, was not only of the Whig-party, but of such abilities and integrity, as brought a new credit to it in the Nation.

1705. "the House of Commons, to grant me the Supplies, which will be requisite for carrying on the next year's service both by sea and land; and, at the same time, to consider, that the giving all possible dispatch, will make the Supply itself much more effectual.

"The firmness and conduct, which the Duke of Savoy has shewn amidst extreme difficulties, is beyond example. I have not been wanting to do all that was possible for me, in order to his being supported.

"I ought to take notice to you, that the King of Prussia's troops have been very useful to this end. Your approbation of that treaty last Session, and the encouragement you gave upon it, leave me no doubt of being able to renew it for another year.

"I take this occasion to assure you, that not only whatever shall be granted by Parliament for bearing the charge of the war, shall be laid out for that purpose with the greatest faithfulness and management; but that I will continue to add, out of my own revenue, all I can reasonably spare, beyond the necessary expences for the honour of the Government.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"By an act of Parliament passed the last winter, I was enabled to appoint Commissioners for this Kingdom, to treat with Commissioners to be empowered by authority of Parliament in Scotland, concerning a nearer and more complete Union between the two Kingdoms, as soon as an act should be made there for that purpose. I think it proper for me to acquaint you, that such an act is lately passed there; and I intend, in a short time, to cause Commissions to be made out, in order to put the treaty on foot, which I heartily desire may prove successful, because I am persuaded, that an Union of the two Kingdoms will not only prevent many inconveniencies, which may otherwise happen, but must conduce to the peace and happiness of both Nations; and therefore I hope I shall have your assistance, in bringing this great work to a good conclusion.

"There is another Union I think myself obliged to recommend to you in the most earnest and affectionate manner; I mean, an Union of minds and affections amongst ourselves. It is that, which would, above all things, disappoint and defeat the hopes and designs of our enemies.

"I cannot but with grief observe, there are some amongst us, who endeavour to foment animosities; but I persuade myself, they will be found to be very few, when you appear to assist me in discountenancing and defeating such practices.

"I mention this with a little more warmth, because there have not been wanting some so very malicious, as even in print to suggest the Church of England, as by law established, to be in danger at this time.

"I am willing to hope, not one of my subjects can really entertain a doubt of my affection to the Church, or so much as suspect, that it will not be my chief care to support it, and leave it secure after me; and therefore we may be certain, that they, who go about to insinuate things of this nature, must be Mine and the Kingdom's enemies, and can only mean to cover designs, which they dare not publicly own, by endeavouring to distract us with unreasonable and groundless distrusts and jealousies.

"I must be so plain, as to tell you, the best proofs we can all give at present of our zeal for the preservation of the Church, will be to join heartily in prosecuting the war against an enemy, who is certainly engaged to extirpate our Religion, as well as to reduce this Kingdom to slavery,

"I am fully resolved, by God's assistance, to do my part.

"I will always affectionately support and countenance the Church of England, as by law established.

"I will inviolably maintain the Toleration.

"I will do all I can to prevail with my subjects to lay aside their divisions, and will study to make them all safe and easy.

"I will endeavour to promote Religion and Virtue amongst them, and to encourage trade, and every thing else, that may make them a flourishing and happy people.

"And they, who shall concur zealously with me in carrying on these good designs, shall be sure of my kindness and favour."

This speech, which was supposed to be drawn up by the new Lord-Keeper, was received with great applause by the generality of the people, and the majority of both Houses of Parliament.

On the 1st of November the Lords attended the Queen with an address, wherein, having taken notice of what had been delivered from the Throne, they assured her, "That they concurred in these her Majesty's wife and noble sentiments; and that no dangers should deter them, nor any artifices divert them, from doing all that was in their power, to assist her Majesty in carrying on the war, till she should be enabled to procure such a peace for Europe, as she had mentioned in her speech. They admired in her Majesty that tender and indulgent affection to her people, which she had shewn from the beginning of her Reign; that earnest desire to unite them amongst themselves, and to make them all easy, safe, and happy under her Government; that steady zeal for the Church of England, as by law established; and that compassion for those, who were so unhappy, as to dissent from her." And they promised, "to do all they could to discountenance and defeat the designs and practices of those, who fomented animosities amongst her people; ever to shew the utmost detestation of those ungrateful and wicked men, who laboured to dishonour her Majesty's Reign, and distract her subjects with unreasonable and groundless jealousies of dangers to the Church of England; and to be ready to concur in all measures requisite to put a stop to the malice of those incendiaries."

The Commons addressed the Queen, five days after, in much the same manner. These addresses of the two Houses went the more easily, because some kept out of the way, from whom it was expected, that they would afterwards open more copiously on the subject. The chairmen of the several Committees of the House of Commons

Address of the Commons about the Union and Succession in Scotland.
Fr. H. C. III. 446.
On the 13th of November, the Commons, having taken the Queen's speech into consideration, presented a second address of thanks for her great care and endeavours to settle the Succession of the Kingdom of Scotland in the House of Hanover, for the preservation of the peace, and promoting the Union of the two Kingdoms, and to assure her, they would, to the utmost of their power, assist her to bring that great work to a happy conclusion. They also desired her to direct, that the whole proceedings of the last Sessions of Parliament in Scotland, relating to the Union and the Succession, might be laid before the House. The Lords had made the same request the day before, and the Queen promised both Houses, that the state of those matters should be laid before them.

The first thing, with which the Commons generally begin, is to receive petitions against the Members returned; and this gave a further discovery of the inclinations of the majority. The corruption of the Nation was grown to such an height, and there was so much foul practice on all hands, that there was no doubt great cause of complaint. The first election, that was judged, was that of St. Albans, where the Duchess of Marlborough had a House. She recommended Admiral Killigrew to those in the town, as was done all over England by Persons of Quality, who had any interest in the Burghers. Yet, though much foul practice was proved on the other hand, and there was not the least colour of evidence to fix any ill practice upon her, some reflected very indecently upon her. Mr. Bromley compared her to Alice Piers in King Edward III's time, and said many other virulent things against her; for indeed she was looked upon by the whole party as the person, who had reconciled the Whigs to the Queen, from whom her Majesty was naturally very averse. Most of the controverted elections were carried in favour of the Whigs; in some few they failed, more by reason of private animosities, than by the strength of the other side.

The supplies granted.
The House of Commons readily voted all the supplies that were asked, and went on to provide proper funds for them.

The most important debates, that were in this Session, began in the House of Lords, the Queen being present at them all. The Lord Haversham opened the motions of the Tory side. On the 15th of November, when the Lords went upon the state of the Nation, the Lord Haversham made a long speech, wherein he arraigned the Duke of Marlborough's conduct, both on the Moselle and in Brabant, and reflected severely on the Dutch, which he carried so far as to say, that the war cost them nothing. He came at length to the point, which was laid to be the debate of the day, and concluded his speech with saying:

"The last thing, my Lords, is that which I take to be of the greatest concernment to us all, both Queen and People. I love always to speak very plain, and shall do so in this point.

"My Lords, I think there can be nothing more for the safety of the Queen, for the preserva"tion of our Constitution, for the security of the Church, and for the advantage of us all, than if the presumptive heir to the Crown, according to the act of Settlement in the Protestant line, should be here amongst us. It is very plain, that nothing can be more for the security of any Throne, than to have a number of Successors round about it, whose interest is always to defend the possessor from any danger, and prevent any attempt against him, and revenge any injury done him. Is there any man, my Lords, who doubts, that if the Duke of Gloucester had been now alive, her Majesty had not been more secure than she is? We cannot think of that misfortune without the greatest grief; but yet we are not to neglect our own safety. And, though a Successor be not the child of the Prince, yet is he the child of the Queen and the People.

"Besides, my Lords, the heats and differences, which are among us, make it very necessary, that we should have the presumptive heir residing here. The duty and respect we pay her Majesty, and the authority of the law, can hardly keep us in peace and union amongst ourselves at present. What then may we not fear, when these bonds shall ever happen to be broken? And would it not be a great advantage to the Church for the presumptive heir to be personally acquainted with the Reverend the Prelates? Nay, would it not be an advantage to all England, that, whenever the Successor comes over, he should not bring a flood of Foreigners along with him, to eat up and devour the good of the land?

"I will say no more to your Lordships, but conclude with this motion;

"That an humble address be presented to her Majesty by this House, that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to invite the presumptive heir to the Crown of England, according to the acts of Parliament made for settling the Succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, into this Kingdom, to reside here."

The Duke of Buckingham, and the Earls of Rocheſter, Nottingham, and Angleſey, carried on the debate with great earnestness. It was urged, That they had sworn to maintain the Succession, and by that were bound to insist on this motion, since there was no means so sure to maintain it, as to have the Successor upon the place, ready to assume and maintain his right. It appeared through our whole History, that whoever came first into England, had always carried it. The pretending Successor might be in England within three days; whereas it might be three weeks before the declared Successor could come. From thence it was inferred, that the danger was apparent and dreadful, if the Successor should not be brought over. If King Charles had been in Spain, when the late King died, probably that would have prevented all this war, in which we were now engaged. With these Lords, by a strange reverse, all the Tories joined; and by another, and as strange a reverse, all the Whigs joined in opposing it. They thought, that this matter was to be left wholly to the Queen; that it was neither proper nor safe either for the Crown or for the Nation, that the heir should not be in an intire dependence on the Queen;

1705. Queen: That a rivalry between the two Courts might occasion great distractions, and be attended with very ill consequences: That the next Successor had expressed a full satisfaction, and rested on the assurances, which the Queen had given her, of her firm adherence to her title, and to the maintaining of it: That the Nation was prepared for it by the orders, which the Queen had given to name her in the daily prayers of the church: That great endeavours had been used to bring the Scots Nation to declare the same Successor: That it was true, we still wanted one great security, not having yet made any provision for carrying on the Government, for maintaining the public Quiet, for proclaiming and sending for the Successor, and for keeping things in order, till the Successor should come. It seemed therefore necessary to make an effectual provision against disorders, that might happen in such an interval. This was proposed first by Bishop Burnet, and seconded by the Lord-Treasurer; and all the Whigs went into it; and then the Question was put upon the other motion, as first made, by a previous division, Whether that should be put or not, and was carried in the negative by about three to one. However, some Lords, who were for the affirmative, entered their protests in the following words: "We humbly conceive, that having a presumptive heir to the Crown residing in the Kingdom, will be a great strengthening to her Majesty's Royal hands, in the Administration of the Government, and Security of her Majesty's Royal person, and of the Succession to the Crown, as by law established, in the Protestant line (1)."

that such a motion might be made by the Whigs, had possessed her with deep prejudices against it; for they had made her apprehend, that, when the next Successor should be brought over, she herself would be so eclipsed by it, that she would be much in the Successor's power, and reign only at her or his courtesy. Yet these very persons were prosecuting that very motion, which they had made her apprehend was the most fatal thing, that could happen. This the Dukes of Marlborough told Bishop Burnet, but named no person; and upon it a very black suspicion was taken up by some, that the proposers of this matter knew, or at least believed, that the Queen would not agree to the motion, which way soever it might be brought to her, whether in an address, or in a bill; and then they might reckon, that this would give such a jealousy, and create such a misunderstanding between Her and the Parliament, or rather the whole Nation, as would unsettle her whole Government, and put all things in disorder. But this was only a suspicion (2).

Though the invitation of the Princess Sophia A bill for was rejected, yet a bill for a Regency, intitled, a Regency. A bill for the better security of her Majesty's Person and Government, and of the Succession to the Crown of England, was brought in. On the 19th of November, the Lord Wharton opened the debate in a manner, that charmed the whole House. He had not been present at the former debate, but he said, he was much delighted with what he had heard concerning it. He observed, that he had ever looked on the securing a Protestant Succession to the Crown as that, which secured all our happiness. He had heard the Queen recommend from the Throne union and agreement to all her subjects, with a great emotion in his own mind. It was now evident, there

(2) The Dukes of Marlborough, in the account of her own conduct (p. 160.) clears up this matter; she says, The Earls of Rochester and Nottingham, and the other grave men of the party, had not the least hope or the least desire to carry their point; but being well assured, that the Queen would never consent to such an invitation, nor pardon her Ministers, if they encouraged the design, this was a notable stratagem to ruin them, either with her Majesty, or with the Nation; for if, in compliance with her prejudices, they opposed this motion, it was to be hoped it would draw the public odium upon them, as declared enemies to the Protestant Succession. This hopeful scheme, however, did not succeed. The Whigs opposed the invitation, and yet preserved their credit, to the great mortification of the other party. I know, that my Lord Godolphin, and other great men, were much reflected upon by some well-disposed persons, for not laying hold of this opportunity, which the Tories put in their hands, of more effectually securing the Succession of the Crown in the House of Hanover. But those of the Whigs, whose anger against the Minister was raised on this account, little knew how impracticable the project of Invitation was, and that the attempt would have only served to make the Queen discard her Ministry, to the ruin of the common cause of these Kingdoms, and of all Europe. I had often tried her Majesty upon this subject, and when I found, that she would not hear of the immediate Successor's coming over, had pressed her, that she would at least invite hither the young Prince of Hanover, who was not to be her immediate Successor, and that she would let him live here as her son: But her Majesty would listen to no proposal of this kind in any shape whatsoever.

—It was upon this occasion, that the Queen gave the first indications of any thing like a real reconciliation to the Whigs. —She had been present at the debate in the House of Lords upon the subject of the invitation, and had heard the Duke of Buckingham treat her with great disrespect, urging as an argument for inviting over the Princess Sophia, that the Queen might live till she did not know what she did, and be like a child in the hands of others, and a great deal to that effect. Such rude treatment from the Tories, and the zeal and success of the Whigs, in opposing a motion so extremely agreeable to her, occasioned her to write to me in the following terms:

—I believe dear Mrs. Freeman and I shall not disagree, as we have formerly done; for I am sensible of the services those people have done me, that you have a good opinion of, and will countenance them, and am thoroughly convinced of the malice and influence of them, that you have always been speaking against.

And at this time it was, that the Queen authorized the Lord Godolphin to give the utmost assurances to the chief men of the Whigs, that she would put herself and her affairs into such hands as they should approve, and would do every thing possible for the security of the Protestant Religion.

1705. there was a Divinity about her, when she spoke: The cause was certainly supernatural, for we saw the miracle, that was wrought by it: Now all were for the Protestant Succession. It had not been always so. He rejoiced in their conversion, and confessed it was a miracle. He would not, he could not, he ought not to suspect the sincerity of those, who moved for inviting the next Successor; yet he could not hinder himself from remembering what had passed in a course of many years, and how men had argued, voted, and protested all that while. This confirmed his opinion, that a miracle was now wrought; and that might oblige some to shew their change by an excess of zeal, which he could not but commend, though he did not fully agree to it. After this preamble, he opened the proposition for the regency in all the branches of it: That Regents should be empowered to act in the name of the Successor, till he should fend over orders: That besides those, whom the Parliament should name, the next Successor should fend over a Nomination sealed up, and to be opened, when that accident should happen, of persons, who should act in the same capacity with those, who should be named by Parliament. The motion, being thus digested, was agreed to by all the Whigs, and a bill was ordered to be brought in, pursuant to these propositions. But, upon the debate on the heads of the bill, it appeared, that the conversion, which the Lord Wharton had so pleasantly magnified, was not so intire as he seemed to suppose. For when a security, that was real and visible, was thus offered, those, who made the other motion, flew off from it. They pretended, that it was, because they could not depart from their first motion: But they were told, that the immediate Successor might indeed, during her life, continue in England; yet it was not to be supposed, that her son, the Elector, could be always absent from his own Dominions, and throw off all care of them, and of the concerns of the Empire, in which he bore so great a share. If he should go over for ever so short a time, the accident might happen, in which it was certainly necessary to provide such an expedient, as was now offered. This exposed them to much censure; but men engaged in parties are not easily put out of countenance. It was resolved, that the Regents should be seven, and no more; and they were fixed by the posts they were in. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord-Chancellor, Lord-Keeper, Lord-Treasurer, Lord-President, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord High-Admiral, and the Lord Chief-Justice of the Queen's-Bench for the time being, were named for that high trust. The Tories struggled hard, that the Lord-Treasurer should not be one, only to shew their spleen against the Lord Godolphin; but their motion was rejected with scorn; for it seemed ridiculous in a time, when there might be much occasion for money, to exclude an Officer from that high trust, who alone could furnish them with it, or direct them how to be furnished. The Tories moved likewise, that the Lord-Mayor of London should be one; but that was also rejected; for the design of the act was, that the Government should be carried on by those, who should be at that time in the conduct and secret of affairs, and were persons nominated by the Queen; whereas the Lord-Mayor was chosen by the City, and had no practice in business. These Regents were required to proclaim the next Successor, and to give orders for the like Proclamation over England and Ireland. The next Successor might send a triplicate of the persons named by her or him; one of these was to be deposited with the Archbishop of Canterbury, another with the Lord-Keeper, and a third with his own Minister residing at this Court; upon the producing whereof, the persons nominated were to join with the Regents, and to act in equality with them. The last Parliament, even though dissolved, was to be immediately brought together, and empowered to continue sitting for six months; and thus things were to be kept in order, till the Successor should either come in person, or fend over his orders.

The Tories made some opposition to every branch of the act; but, in that of the Parliament's sitting, the opposition was more remarkable. The Earl of Rocheſter moved, That the Parliament and the Regents should be limited to pass no act of repeal of any part of the act of Uniformity; and in his positive way said, that, if this was not agreed to, he should still think the Church was in danger, notwithstanding what they had heard from the Throne in the beginning of the Session. It was objected to this, that, if the Regal power was in the Regents, and if the Parliament was likewise a legal one, then by the Constitution the whole Legislature was in them, and that could not be limited; for they could repeal any law, that limited them: But the Judges were of opinion, that the power of Regents might be limited; so that, as the design of moving this might be to have a new pretence to possess the Clergy, that there was a secret design against the Church, which might break out at such a time, the Lords gave way to it, though they thought it unreasonable, and proposed with no good design. The Tories, upon the yielding this to them, proposed a great many more limitations; such as the restraining the Regents from consenting to a repeal of the act for Triennial Parliaments; the acts for Trials in cases of Treason, and some others; and so extravagant were they in their design of making the act appear ridiculous, that they proposed as a limitation, that they should not have power to repeal the act of Succession. All these were rejected with scorn and indignation; the Lords seeing by this their error in yielding to that proposed by the Earl of Rocheſter. The bill passed in the House of Lords, but the Tories protested against it.

There was not any thing in the management of the Tories, by which they suffered more in their reputation than by this. They hoped, that the motion for the invitation would have cleared them of all suspicion of inclinations towards the pretended Prince of Wales, and would have reconciled the body of the Nation to them, and turned them against all, who should oppose it. The management was so ill disguised, that it was visible they intended only to provoke the Queen by it, hoping that the provocation might go so far, that in the sequel all their designs might be brought about, though by a method, that seemed quite contrary to them, and destructive of them.

The bill lay long in the House of Commons, by a secret management, that was against it. The Tories there likewise proposed, on the 14th of December, III.

Great opposition made to it.

A secret management in the House of Commons. Burnet. Pr. H. C.

1705. December, that the next Successor should be brought over; which was moved by Sir Thomas Hammer, seconded by Mr. Benson, and supported by Mr. Bramley, and others. This was opposed by the Whigs, who moved, That the Chairman leave the chair; which was carried in the affirmative without dividing. The secret management was from Hanover. Some indigent persons, and others employed by the Tories, had studied to infuse jealousies of the Queen and her Ministers into the Electress Sophia. She was then seventy-five, but had still so much vivacity, that, as she was the most knowing and the most entertaining woman of the age, so she seemed willing to change her scene, and to come and shine here in England. They prevailed with her to write a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, intimating her readiness to come over, if the Queen and Parliament should desire it. This was made public by some intriguing persons in that Court, and a colour was soon found to keep some Whigs from agreeing to the act. In the act, which first settled the Succession, one limitation had been, that, when the Crown should pass into that House, no man, who had either place or pension, should be capable of sitting in the House of Commons. The clause in this bill, which empowered either the Parliament, which should be current at the Queen's death, or that which had late last (though dissolved) to sit for six months, or till the Successor should dissolve it, seemed contrary to this incapacitating clause in the former act. Great exceptions were taken to this by some zealous Whigs, who were so possessed with the notion of a self-denying bill, as necessary to preserve public liberty from the practices of a designing Court, that for some weeks there was cause to fear, not only the loss of the bill, but a breach among the Whigs upon this head. Much pains were taken, and with good effect, to heal this. It was at last settled; and a great many offices were enumerated; and it was declared, that every man, who held any of these, was thereby incapacitated from sitting in the House of Commons; and every Member of the House, who accepted of any other office, was, upon that, excluded the House, and a new writ was to go out to those, whom he represented, to chuse again; but it was left free to them to chuse him, or any other, as they pleased. It was desired by those, who pressed this matter most, that it should take place only in the next Reign. But, to remove all jealousy, the Ministers were content, that these clauses should take place immediately, upon the dissolution of the present

The act of the Regency passed.

Parliament. And, when the House of Commons sent up these self-denying clauses to the Lords, they added to them a repeal of that clause in the first act of Succession, by which the succeeding Princes were limited to govern by the advice of their Council, and by which all the Privy-Counsellors were to be obliged to sign their advices; which was impracticable, since it was visible, that no man would be a Privy-Counsellor on those terms. The Lords added the repeal of this clause to the amendments sent up by the Commons; and they made some alterations in the clause inserted by the Commons, their Lordships excluding only the Commissioners of the Prize-office, and all such new officers, as the Court might create for the time to come. Two Conferences were held about these respective amendments between the two Houses; and, the report of the latter Conference being made in the House of Commons, on the 15th of February, it occasioned a long and warm debate. The Court-party endeavoured to shew the injustice of excluding from the House such as were actually performing services to the Nation; urging, that all Counties and Corporations of England have, by their Charters, liberty to elect such, as they think best qualified to represent them in Parliament; they should, in great measure, be deprived of that liberty by this exclusion of several officers, military and civil; who, by reason of the great estates they have in those Corporations, seldom fail, and have more right than any others, to be chosen. And that the exclusion of those Officers would very much abate the noble ardour, which several Gentlemen shewed at this juncture, to serve the Nation in this just and necessary war, since they could not but look upon it as a disgrace, to be made incapable of serving likewise their Country in Parliament. The opposite party, which chiefly consisted of the Tories, with whom several of the Whigs joined on this occasion, alleged, the ill use, which a bad Prince might make of a Parliament, in which there should be many of his creatures; such are generally all those, who have employments immediately depending on the Crown. The other party, foreseeing that they should lose the question, agreed to the postponing of three of the Lords amendments, having already agreed to one of them. But, three days after, being reinforced by the return of those, who, for some time, had voted on the contrary side, the Lords amendments were approved, with some few alterations; to which the Lords agreed on the 19th of February (1).

On

(1) The debates in both Houses about the invitation of the Princess Sophia having made a great noise, Mr. Charles Gildon, a Writer, well known for his share in the Oracles of Reason, and for his confutation of that book afterwards, either by directions from others, or out of mere zeal, handed to the press a letter from Sir Rowland Gwynne to the Right Honourable the Earl of Stamford, dated at Hanover, January 1, O. S. 1705-6, importing in substance, "That the Princess Sophia being informed, that her good intentions to the Queen and Nation were misrepresented, some having reported, That she might give a rise to intrigues against the Queen and the Public, if she came thither; she thought herself therefore obliged to declare to the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury and others, to whom she wrote, and also to "tell the Duke of Marlborough and the Earl of Sunderland, when they were at Hanover, That she would always most sincerely maintain a true friendship with the Queen, and also be ready to comply with the desires of the Nation in whatever depended upon her, though she should hazard her person in passing the seas, if they thought it necessary towards the establishment of the Protestant Succession, and for the good of the Kingdom. But that, in the mean time, she lived in great quiet and content there, without meddling with parties or cabals, and left it to the Queen and Parliament to do whatever they should think fit. That none but Jacobites can have the malice to invent and insinuate to others, That the presence of the Successor was dangerous. That we had been proud to say, that the House of Hanover, the people of England, that it was turned against those, who made it. For, on the 27th of November, the two Houses attended the Queen with an address, importing, "That being justly alarmed by the many artifices, which the emissaries of France had put in practice the last year, in order to raise jealousies, and create misunderstandings amongst the Allies; and being apprehensive lest such malicious insinuations, if they should pass unobserved, might in time so far take place, as to abate the spirit, and slacken the zeal of the Confederacy; they most humbly besought her Majesty, to use all possible endeavours to preserve a good correspondence amongst all the Confederates, and, in a particular manner, to maintain and cultivate a strict friendship with the States-General of the United-Provinces; as also, by all proper means, to excite the whole Confederacy to make early and effectual preparations, and to exert their utmost vigour in the prosecution of the war against France." This had a very good effect in Holland; for the agents of France were, at the same time, both spreading reports in England, that the Dutch were inclined to a peace; and, in Holland, that the English had unkind thoughts of them. The design was to alienate us from each other, that so both might be the better disposed to hearken to a project of peace, which, in the present state of affairs, was the most destructive thing, that could be thought on; and all motions, that looked that way, gave very evident discoveries of the bad intentions of those who made them.

The Queen having laid before the two Houses the addresses of the Scots Parliament against any progress in the treaty of Union, till the act, which declared them Aliens by such a day, should be repealed; the Tories, upon this occasion, to make themselves popular, after they had failed in many attempts, resolved to promote this, apprehending, that the Whigs, who had first moved for that act, would be for maintaining their own work; but they seemed to be much surprized, when, after they had prefaced their motions in this matter with such declarations of their intentions for the public good, that shewed they expected opposition and a debate;

"and our posterity were most obliged to the Whigs, next to the King, for settling the Succession of that most serene House; and how much should we be to be blamed, if we should lose this merit, by parting with our principles, that were so well grounded upon honour and the public good, and by destroying the work of our own hands for a base and uncertain interest, or for a blind obedience to those, who led others where they pleased, and yet were led themselves by their passions or imaginary prospects, of which they might yet be disappointed? For, if they hoped to get into favour by such methods, they could not be long serviceable, nor preserve the favour they sought; for they would soon be cast off, when it was found, that they had lost the esteem and affection of the people by their weak or mercenary conduct. That they could not do any thing, that would better please their enemies; for, while they thought to keep down the Tories by a majority, and oppose them, even in things so reasonable and just, they would raise the reputation of that party, instead of lessening it. That he was sorry for those, who suffered themselves to be imposed upon; but they, who had wicked designs, might one day repent of them; for they must ei-

"ther plunge the Nation into the greatest confusion, to make it unable to punish them, or be answerable for the dangers, into which they were like to bring it. That he could not conceive what colour any body could have for so base an insinuation, as, 'That the coming of the Electress into England would set up two Courts, that would oppose each other; for the Electress declared, That she would be intirely united with the Queen; and that all those, who imagined she would countenance any intrigue against her Majesty, would be very much deceived in their expectations. That supposing, contrary to all appearance, that discontented ill men might impose upon the Electress's good nature, and incline her to do such things, as might displease the Queen; what hurt could that do, since her Royal Highness's Court could have no power in England, and must be subject to the Queen's Court? So that it was most absurd to make people believe, that this pretended opposition of the two Courts could bring the Nation into so great dangers, as those they might avoid by having the Protestant heir in the Kingdom. That the keeping the Protestant heir at a distance must be grounded upon two suppositions equally wicked and criminal: First, That the Queen was against the Electress's

1705. a debate, the Whigs not only agreed to this, but carried the matter further to the other act relating to their manufacture and trade. This passed very unanimously in both Houses; and, by this means, way was made for opening a treaty, as soon as the Session should come to an end. All the Northern parts of England, that had been disturbed for some years with apprehensions of a war with Scotland, which would certainly be mischievous to them, whatever the end of it might prove, were much delighted with the prospect of peace and union with their neighbours.

The Commons, in the mean while, proceeded with great unanimity in voting several branches of the Supply; and the question being proposed on the 22d of November, Whether it should be referred to the Committee, to consider, that, in the clause for adding ten thousand men to act in conjunction with the Dutch, it should be provided, that the Dutch be obliged to leave off trading with France? It was carried in the negative by a majority of an hundred and eighty-four against an hundred and seventeen.

The Queen's Speech about the Spanish affairs.
Pr. H. C. III. 447.

The Nation having been long in suspense about the success of the Earl of Peterborough's expedition, when the account of it was at last brought by Captain Norris in the Britannia, with the Lord Shannon and Brigadier Stanhope, the Queen went to the House of Peers on the 27th of November, and, the Commons being sent for, she made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"HAvING newly received letters from the King of Spain and the Earl of Peterborough, which contain a very particular account of our great and happy successes in Catalonia, and shewing, at the same time, the reasonableness of their being immediately supported; I look upon this to be a matter of so much consequence in itself, and so agreeable to you, that I have ordered a copy of the King of Spain's letter to myself; a letter from the Junta of the military arm of Catalonia; and another letter from the City of Vich; as also an extract of the Earl of Peterborough's letter to me, to be communicated to both Houses of Parliament.

"I recommend the consideration of them to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, very particularly, as the speediest way to restore the Monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria. And therefore I assure myself, you will enable me to prosecute the advantages we have gained, in the most effectual manner, and to improve the opportunity, which God Almighty is pleased to afford us, of putting a prosperous end to the present war.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I must not lose this occasion of desiring you to give as much dispatch to the matters before you, as the nature of them will allow; that for our preparations for the next year may be early, which cannot fail of being of great advantage to us."

The Commons being returned to their House, Mr. Secretary Hedges laid before them the letters mentioned in the Queen's speech; and, two days after, they voted the granting of several sums, and, in particular, two hundred and fifty thousand pounds, for her Majesty's proportion of the charge of prosecuting the successes already gained by King Charles III, for the recovery of the Monarchy of Spain to the House of Austria (1).

After the act for the Regency had passed, the Lord Halifax remembering what the Earl of Rochester had said concerning the danger, the Church might be in, moved, that a day might be appointed, to inquire into these dangers, about which so many tragical stories had been published of late. Accordingly, the 6th of December was appointed for this purpose, when the Earl of Rochester began the debate (the Queen being present) and told their Lordships, "That

"lettress's coming over: And secondly, That her being in England, during the Queen's life, was a thing ill in itself. That, in short, to oppose the further securing of the Protestant Succession was to act directly for the Jacobites; and to hinder the Successor's coming into England was to oppose the further securing of the Succession." This letter having been published, and giving great offence to the Ministry, a complaint was made of it, on the 8th of March, in the House of Commons, who, after the reading of it, came to this resolution, "That it was a scandalous, false, and malicious libel, tending to create a misunderstanding between her Majesty and the Princess Sophia, and highly reflecting upon her Majesty, upon the Princess Sophia, and upon the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament: That an address be presented to her Majesty, that she would be pleased to give order for the discovery and prosecuting the Author, Printer, and Publishers of the said pamphlet; and that the said resolutions be communicated to the Lords at a conference, and their concurrence desired thereunto." The Lords readily concurred with the Commons; and, upon the two Houses presenting the address, on the 12th of March, pursuant to the said resolutions, the Queen told them, "That nothing could be more acceptable to her, than so reasonable an instance of "their concern to preserve a good understanding between Her and the Princess Sophia, and of their care to defeat the artifices of designing and malicious men. That she was fully sensible of the very ill designs of the paper, which they had so justly censured; and she would not fail to give the necessary directions for complying, in the most effectual manner, with all they desired in their address." Accordingly, about a year after, on the 14th of February 1706-7, Mr. Charles Gildon was tried at Guild-Hall, and, being found guilty of publishing Sir Rowland Gwynne's letter to the Earl of Stamford, was fined, on the 12th of May 1707, one hundred pounds by the Court of the Queen's Bench. Pr. H. C. III.

(1) On the 15th of November, the Duke of Montague was in that quality introduced into the House of Peers; as was, on the 3d of December, the Duke of Argyle of the Kingdom of Scotland, as Baron and Earl of the Kingdom of England, by the title of Baron of Chatham, and Earl of Greenwich in the County of Kent. The same day the Queen came to the House of Peers with the usual state, and gave the Royal assent to an act for exhibiting a bill in this present Parliament, for naturalizing the most excellent Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and the issue of her body.

1705. "That the subject-matter of it was of so tender a nature, that it was difficult to speak to it: for her Majesty had expressed herself so conclusively in her speech, that it seemed to be to contradict the Queen, to speak freely: But in regard that the Ministers might be supposed to make the speeches, he desired, that what he had said might not be offensive to the Queen, for whom he had all the affection and respect, that could be. He urged, that Ministers might mistake, and not always act for the public good; and instanced in the Ministry of Portugal, where the King was our friend, but the Ministry seemed to be otherwise, inasmuch that the Alliance was of no benefit to us: And added, that the Duke of Buckingham and Archbishop Laud were heartily in the interest of King Charles I. but did many things, that very much injured him. The full expressions in the Queen's speech he compared to the law in King Charles the Second's time, to make it treason to call the King a Popish; for which very reason, he said, he always thought him so. The reasons he gave for his fear of the Church's danger arose from these three causes: First, the act of Security in Scotland: Secondly, the Heir of the House of Hanover not being sent for over: Thirdly, the not passing the Occasional bill. Upon the first, he said, the Presbyterian Church in Scotland was fully established without a Toleration. That to arm that people, was to give them a power to invade England, where they had a powerful party for their friends, who never wanted the will to destroy the Church. That he thought the Heir to the Crown ought to be present among us, in order to be fully acquainted with us and our constitution, and thereby enabled to prevent any evil designs upon the Church and State. That the Occasional Conformity bill was in itself so reasonable, and the Church's request in it so small, that the industry in opposing it gave the greater ground for suspicion."

When the Earl had done, the House sat still a quarter of an hour, expecting that some body would second him; but, no other Lord speaking on that side, the Lord Hallifax said, "That, he having moved for the present debate, it might be expected, that he should speak to it. He said, the act of Security in Scotland was a National thing, wholly foreign to Church-affairs. That it was passed only to prevent an immediate war, which the Scots seemed to have resolved upon. That, in case it should ever be made use of, it would be but as other wars with that Nation had been in former days, wherein England was always able to defend itself, and would be sure hereafter to be more able to do it, inasmuch that the strength of England was increased much more in proportion than that of Scotland, so that, unless France, whose hands were already too full, should come into the quarrel, it would signify little: But that, by God's blessing, things were so well compromised with the Scots, and their former heats so much abated, that there was no reason to doubt of an amicable issue of that difference. 1705. As to the House of Hanover, he said, that was a danger but of eight days standing; for he durst say, a fortnight ago, no body made the absence of the Princess Sophia a danger to the Church: And, as for her absence upon the Queen's demise, that was now so well provided for by the act for Lords Justices, that he thought no evil could possibly happen to the Church before her arrival. That he wondered the House of Hanover should be now esteemed such a security to the Church, whereas, when the laws were made for the security of that Succession, it was generally reckoned a hardship upon the Church; urging, that a Clergyman, in a company of Convocation-men, had openly called the Princess Sophia an unbaptized Lutheran, the truth of which he could prove. As to the Occasional bill, he said, that matter had been canvassed already; and it was then the opinion of that House, that it would not prove of any advantage and security to the Church, but rather the contrary. That, upon the whole, there had been times in their memory, wherein the Church might be said to be in danger. That King Charles II. was a Roman Catholic; at least, his brother thought fit to declare it after his death; and the Successor, who had the management of all affairs, was known to be such; and yet the Church thought herself then secure; and those patriots, who stood up in its defence, and endeavoured to prevent the evils, which might ensue from a Popish Successor, were discountenanced and punished. Nay (added his Lordship) when that Successor came to the Throne, and that the Church was very apparently in the greatest danger by the High-Commission Courts, and otherwise, we were then indeed generally alarmed; but we know who fate in that Court, and went large steps in the work then on foot (1). That, soon after the Succession of King William to the Crown, the cry of the Church's danger began, and was continued all his Reign, but with what ground his Lordship was yet unacquainted with. That, upon her Majesty's happy Succession, for some time the complaint was silent; but that, when she was pleased to make some alterations in her Ministry, it was immediately revived, and ever since continued: And so his Lordship concluded, that the Church was now in no danger."

The Bishop of London (Compton) coming in to the House just as these last words were delivered, immediately took up the Lord Hallifax; giving for his reason of the Church's being in danger, "That profaneness and irreligion were so rife among us, and the licentiousness of the press so intolerable, that a most vile book had been lately published by a Clergyman in his Diocese (meaning Mr. Hickeringhill) whom he had endeavoured to punish; but that he had such subterfuges in the quirks of the law, that he could not come at him: And that sermons were preached, wherein rebellion was countenanced, and resistance to the higher powers encouraged." To this the Bishop of Salisbury

Salisbury replied, "That his Lordship ought to have been the last man to complain of that sermon (meaning Mr. Benjamin Hoadley's before the Lord-Mayor) for, if the doctrine of that sermon was not good, he did not know what defence his Lordship could make for his appearing in arms at Nottingham. Then the Bishop, proceeding to the question in debate, instanced in a piece of French History in the Reign of Henry the Third (which, he said, had been much in vogue of late in a neighbouring house *) in whose time the Catholics set up the same cry of the Church's danger from the Huguenots, and forced the King to comply with them; but that, their power thereby becoming great, they turned it upon the King himself, and he found he should be thrust into a Monastery, if he did not speedily crush them, and therefore flattered the Duke of Guise to the heart. To the reasons, which the noble Lord, who began the debate, gave for the Church's danger, he replied, That, as to the Scots affairs, he was particularly acquainted with them, and therefore he would venture to speak with the more assurance. That the Scots Kirk being established without a Toleration was an unfair allegation; for their needed no law for Toleration, where there was no law to inhibit. The Episcopals were not forbid to worship God their own way, being only excluded from Livings; and that there were at that time fourteen Episcopal Meeting-Houses in Edinburgh, as open as the Churches, and as freely resorted to; in many of which the English Liturgy was used, but that in several of them the Queen was not prayed for. And the bill for giving Patrons liberty of conferring their benefices on Clerks Episcopally ordained would have passed (at least, King William had allowed it) if they would have put in a clause to oblige them to take the oath to the Government; but, upon offering that clause, the person, that solicited it, let it drop. That, if the Lord, who had mentioned the act of Security, had looked two years backwards, he might have found another law, which seemed much more to his purpose: namely, the act for confirming Presbytery, 1 Anne; but his Lordship was a Minister of State, when that Act passed, and so perhaps advised it." As to the argument of the Hanover family, it was not observed, that the Bishop offered any thing remarkable; and, for the Occasional Conformity bill, he said, "It had been there already sufficiently argued, and he was glad they were rid of it: But, as to what a noble Prelate had advanced, he owned, that the Church would always be subject to the enmity of profaneness and irreligion: That the devil would have his agents in the world, be the Government never so careful; but he hoped he might say, that irreligion and profaneness were not now at a higher pitch than usually: That he hoped quite the contrary, and thought the Society set up for Reformation in London, and other cities, had contributed considerably to the suppressing of vice. He was sure the Corporation for the propagation of the Gospel had done a great deal towards instructing men in Religion, by giving great numbers of books in practical Divinity; by erecting libraries in country parishes; by sending over many able Divines to the foreign Plantations; erecting libraries for their use; and setting up schools to breed up children in Christian knowledge: That, to his knowledge, one thousand two hundred pounds had been expended, the year before, in books to these purposes, all collected by voluntary contribution, but, in truth, very little from those, who appeared so wonderfully zealous for the Church. That the press was indeed become very licentious, and sermons were preached, wherein very strange expressions were published: That he would read some of them to their Lordships; and then taking out Tilly's and Madder's sermons, and having read some paragraphs, these, said he, were preached at Oxford, and these are the men picked out for public occasions." Then the Archbishop of York, standing up, said, That he apprehended danger from the increase of Dissenters, and particularly from the many Academies set up by them; and moved, "That the Judges might be consulted what laws were in force against such Seminaries, and by what means they might be suppressed." Hereupon the Lord Wharton moved, "That the Judges might also be consulted, about means of suppressing Schools and Seminaries held by Nonjurors, in one of which a noble Lord of that House had both his sons educated." Upon which the same Archbishop stood up again, and said, "He supposed he was the person meant, and therefore he must explain that matter. He owned his two sons were taught by Mr. Ellis, a sober virtuous man, and a man of letters, who had qualified himself according to law, when they were sent to him; but, when the Abjuration-oath was enjoined, it seems, he refused it; which, as soon as he was informed of, he took his sons from him." The Lord Wharton, having made a reply to this, went on, and said, "That, although he had been born and bred a Dissenter, yet he soon conformed to the Church, when he grew up, and became acquainted with its doctrine and discipline: That he was now firmly resolved, by God's blessing, always to continue in that Church, and would go as far in defending it as any man. Wherefore, if he were now sensible, that it was in any danger, he would heartily concur in providing remedies against it; but that, after all the cry and expectation they were screwed up to, hearing wherein those dangers consisted, it appeared just as he expected, namely, that it was only repeating the Memorial, which pamphlet he had carefully read over, but could learn nothing from it, except that the D— of B—, the * Buck- E— of R— †, the E— of N— ‡, ingham, were out of place. What these B's, R's, † Rochester, and N's meant, he could not tell: Perhaps ‡ Nottingham, there might be some charm in it for the Church's security; but, if these letters meant some noble persons there present, he remembered very well, that some of them sat in the High-Commission Court, and then made no complaints of the Church's danger: But now that we had a Queen, who was herself a real lover of the Church, and had given such encouragement and bountiful tokens of her affection to it, we must be amused with the Church's danger. But he concluded, with being of opinion, That the Church was in no danger."

1705. "danger." Then Patrick, Bishop of Ely, stood up, and moved, "That the Judges might be consulted, what power the Queen had in visiting the Universities; complaining of the heat and passion of the Gentlemen there, which they inculcated into their pupils, who brought the same fury with them to the parishes, when they came abroad, to the great disturbance of public charity. That, at the election at Cambridge, it was shameful to see an hundred or more young Students encouraged in hollowing, like school-boys and porters, and crying out, No Fanatics, no Occasional Conformity, against two worthy Gentlemen who stood Candidates. Adding another complaint, of the undutifulness of the Clergy to their Bishops, and the difficulty the latter had to govern them regularly." Hough, Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, made the same complaint; spoke of the opprobrious names, which the Clergy gave their Bishops, and of the calumnies they laid on them, as if they were in a plot to destroy the Church, and had compounded to be the last of their order; and, when the plot was ripe, to resign their Bishoprics, and accept of a pension for life. He alledged, That the Church was as well governed, as it had at any time been; challenged any body to charge the Bishops with any omission of their duty, or any action, wherein they strained their power, or injured any body; mentioned the honour he had to suffer in a good cause; and added, that he thought that might have protected his reputation from the aspersions of being an enemy to the Church. Hooper, Bishop of Bath and Wells, complained of the terms of High-Church and Low-Church, saying, "That it was an invidious distinction, tending to set us at enmity: That, by High-Church, people were made to believe a man inclined to Popery, or, at least, one, that endeavoured to carry Church-power beyond our Constitution; which he thought was great injustice to the Gentlemen, that bore that character, who meant nothing more, than to keep up the just dignity and discipline of the Church: Neither did he believe, that the others, called the Low Church, had any designs of lowering or levelling it with Presbyterianism, as was, on the other hand, maliciously suggested." The Duke of Leeds observed, "That he apprehended the Church was in danger, and that it could not be safe without the act against Occasional Conformity: Adding, that the Queen had, in a discourse with him, declared herself of that opinion." The Lord Sommers recapitulated all the arguments on both sides (1), added his own judgment, and ended with a declaration, "That the Nation was happy, and under a most wise and just Administration, wherein the public money was justly applied, the Treasury kept in a most regular method, and thereby the public credit in the highest esteem: The armies and fleets were supplied; and the success of her Majesty's arms gave the Nation greater honour and reputation than had ever been known; and that we had a fair prospect of bringing the war to a happy conclusion, to the immortal honour of the present age, and to the inexpressible benefit and safety of posterity. Wherefore for men to raise groundless jealousies, at this time of day, could mean no less than an intention to imbroil us at home, and to defeat all those glorious designs abroad." The debate being at length over, the question was put, Whether the Church of England was in danger? which, upon a division, was carried in the negative by a majority of sixty-one voices against thirty; and then their Lordships made the following vote, viz. "Resolved by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, that the Church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extremest danger by King William III. of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, under the happy Reign of her Majesty, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and that whoever goes about to suggest and insinuate, that the Church is in danger under her Majesty's Administration, is an enemy to the Queen, the Church, and the Kingdom (2).

The

(1) Bishop Burnet gives us the substance of the debates in the following manner: On the day appointed we were all made believe, that we should hear many frightful things: But our expectations were not answered: Some spoke of danger from the Presbytery, what was settled in Scotland: Some spoke of the absence of the next Successor: Some reflected on the Occasional bill, that was rejected in that House: Some complained of the Schools of the Dissenters: And others reflected on the principles, that many had drank in, that were different from those formerly received, and that seemed destructive of the Church.

In opposition to all this, it was said, that the Church was safer now than ever it had been: At the Revolution, provision was made, that our King must be of the Reformed Religion, nor was this all; in the late act of Succession it was enacted, that he should be of the Communion of the Church of England: It was not reasonable to object to the House the rejecting a bill, which was done by the majority, of whom it became not the lesser number to complain: We had all our former laws left to us, not only intire, but fortified by late additions and explanations; so that we were safer in all these, than we had been at any time formerly: The Dissenters gained no new strength, they were visibly decreasing: The Toleration had softened their tempers, and they concurred zealously in serving all the ends of the Government; nor was there any particular complaint brought against them: They seemed quiet and content with their Toleration, if they could be but secure of enjoying it: The Queen was taking the most effectual means possible, to deliver the Clergy from the depressions of poverty, that brought them under much contempt, and denied them the necessary means and helps of study: The Bishops looked after their dioceses with a care, that had not been known in the memory of man: Great sums were yearly raised, by their care and zeal, for serving the Plantations better than had ever yet been done: A spirit of zeal and piety appeared in our Churches, and at Sacrament, beyond the example of former times. In one respect it was acknowledged the Church was in danger; there was an evil spirit and a virulent temper spread among the Clergy; there were many indecent sermons preached on public occasions, and those hot Clegymen, who were not the most regular in their lives, had raised factions in many dioceses against their Bishops: These were dangers created by those very men, who filled the Nation with this out-cry against imaginary ones, while their own conduct produced real and threatening dangers. Burnet, Vol. II. 435.

(2) However this resolution was opposed by many Lords, who entered the following reasons for dissenting from it: First, "Because they conceived their might be

The Commons concur with the Lords.
P. H. C.

The next day, December 7, the Lords sent a message to the Commons, to acquaint them with their proceedings, and to desire their concurrence to their resolution in relation to the Church. Whereupon the question was put the day following, Whether they should consider of that message in a Committee, or in a full House? It being carried for the latter, by a majority of two hundred and twenty-two voices against one hundred and sixty-one, Mr. Bromley opened the debate with a speech, wherein he endeavoured to prove the Church to be in danger, by the same arguments that had been insisted on in the House of Peers, such as, "The power of the Presbyterians in Scotland, where the Church of England was not so much as tolerated: The absence of the next Protestant Successor, in case of the Queen's demise: The want of an act against Occasional Conformity: The increase of Presbyterian Schools and Seminaries: Profaneness, Immorality, and Irreligion: And the act of Security passed in Scotland: To which he added another, viz. "the abuse and ill dispensation of her Majesty's late bounty to the Clergy." Sir John Packington, who spoke on the same side, urged the licentiousness of the press, and the great number of libels, which were daily published against the Church; the increase of Presbyterian Conventicles; and the Lords resolution itself, which was the subject-matter of their debate, as proofs of the Church's being in danger; adding, "That, if the Commons agreed to that resolve, the same would, in some measure, have the force of an act of Parliament, which would be a dangerous weapon in the hands of ill Ministers of State, who thereby might awe people into silence, in case the fancy should take them to suppress Episcopacy." The opposite party answered these arguments, and, after a long debate, the Lords resolution was agreed to by a majority of two hundred and twelve against a hundred and sixty; and, on the 14th of December, the Commons agreed likewise with the Lords in an address to the Queen, containing the resolution relating to the Church, "beseeching her withal, to take effectual measures for making the resolution public; and also for punishing the authors and spreaders of the seditious and scandalous reports of the Church being in danger." The Queen answered, "That she should freely comply with their address, and was very well pleased to find both Houses so forward to join with her in putting a stop to these malicious reports." And, according to the desire of both Houses, the Queen, on the 20th of December, ordered a proclamation to be issued out, for making their Resolution public; and for discovering the Author of the Memorial of the Church of England, and apprehending David Edwards, a professed Papist, charged upon oath to be the Printer and Publisher of that libel (1)."

The Queen came, the next day, to the House of Peers, and among other bills, gave the Royal assent to the land-tax bill; and also to an act for the naturalization of the most excellent Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and the issue of her body; which done, she made a speech to both Houses, wherein she took notice of the unanimity of their proceedings, and of the good disposition they had shewn towards an Union with Scotland; and returned the Commons thanks for the great dispatch of this seasonable Supply, not doubting but, after the recess, they would return with the same good dispositions to give all possible dispatch to the public affairs still depending. The Commons, having resolved to present an address of thanks for this speech, adjourned

"be dangers to the Church always impending on several accounts: That the Prayers set forth to be used on the solemn fast-days, under the head of a Prayer for unity, imploring God Almighty's grace, that every body may seriously lay to heart the great danger we are in by our unhappy divisions, shewed plainly, that, in the opinion of the Compilers of that form of prayer, and in her Majesty's judgment, who commanded it to be used in all the Churches and Chapels throughout England and Wales, there were very many dangers." Secondly, "They conceived the Church in danger from a neighbouring Kingdom, which, though under her Majesty's Sovereignty, during her life, had not yet been induced to settle the same Succession to the Crown, as was established in this Kingdom in the Protestant line; but that, on the contrary, that Succession had been abrogated by the act of Security, which, with several other acts passed in that Kingdom, had been judged by this House to be dangerous to the present and future peace of this Kingdom." Thirdly, "They conceived there might be very great dangers to the Church for want of a law to prevent any persons whatsoever from holding any offices of trust and authority, both in Church and State, who were not constantly of the Communion of the Church established by law; and therefore on the account of the unhappy divisions in point of religious and divine worship, as also on the account of the calamities of the age, in the too public and common disowning any Religion at all, the Church might be in danger." Fourthly, "Though they had an intire confidence in her Majesty's zeal and piety to the Church, they durst not, in duty to her Majesty,

"and the service of the Government, condemn all such as might have fears, in relation to the preservation of the Church and safety of the Crown." And, Fifthly, "being sincerely convinced, that these reasons, among others mentioned in the debate, were sufficient to justify their fears, they conceived that it was not a proper way to prevent dangers, by voting there are none." These reasons were signed by the following Peers,

Duke of Buckingham,	Lord Craven,
Earl of Northampton,	Lord Chandos,
Earl of Caernarvon,	Lord Guernsey,
Earl of Weymouth,	Earl of Thanet,
Lord Osborn,	Earl of Scarfale,
Earl of Denbigh,	Earl of Rochester,
Dr. George Hooper, Bishop of Bath and Wells,	Lord Conway,
Lord Granville,	Lord Howard of Eversick,
Duke of Beaufort,	Henry, Bishop of London,
Earl of Winchelsea,	Duke of Leeds,
Earl of Nottingham,	Lord Guildford,
Lord North and Grey,	Earl of Abingdon,
Earl of Anglesea,	Lord Haverham.

The Lord Haverham protested only for the first, second, and fourth reasons. The Archbishop of York, the Bishop of St. Asaph, the Earl of Suffolk, and the Lord Leigh were of the thirty, who voted against the resolution, but did not enter their protest; and the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Rochester protested afterwards.

(1) In the debates of this Session some severe remarks

1705. journed themselves to the 7th of January following.

1705-6. As soon as the Commons met again, they resolved "to give the thanks of their House to the Duke of Marlborough, for his great services performed to her Majesty and the Nation in the last campaign, and for his prudent negotiations with her Allies." And they appointed a Committee for that purpose, who having attended the Duke, he said, "He was so sensible of the great honour, that was done him by this message, that he could not have the least concern at the reflections of any private malice, while he had the satisfaction of finding his faithful endeavours to serve the Queen, and the Kingdom, so favourably accepted by the House of Commons." The next day, Mr. Secretary Hedges acquainted the House, "That her Majesty, in pursuance of the address of both Houses, had put out a proclamation, in which was an encouragement for the discovery of the Author of the Memoir of the Church of England, &c. The Printer of which book being now in custody, and other persons examined, in whose depositions there appeared the names of some Members of this House; her Majesty's tenderness for any thing, which had the appearance of the privileges of this House, had inclined her to command him to acquaint this House, before she directed any further proceedings in that examination." Upon this the Commons resolved, "That an address of thanks be presented to her Majesty, for her tender regard to the privileges of this House; and to desire, that she would be pleased to give order for the further examination into the Authors of the libel mentioned in her message." Which address being presented, the Queen answered, "That she was glad to find this House express so much resentment against the libel mentioned in her message, and took very kindly the confidence the House reposed in her, which she would make the best use of for the advantage of the public."

It is to be observed, that, on the 15th of January, David Edwards, Printer of the Memorial, who had a long time absconded, and was left without any support by the party, that employed him, was, by his own consent, taken into custody of a State-messenger, upon promise in writing from Mr. Secretary Harley, "That he should have his pardon, provided he discovered the Author or Authors of that pamphlet." Three days after, being examined before the same Secretary, he pretended he could fix it upon three Gentlemen, Members of the House of Commons, Mr. Pooley, Mr. Ward, and Sir Humphrey Mackworth; and related, that a woman in a mask, with another barefaced, brought the manuscript to him, and made a bargain with him to have two hundred and fifty printed copies of it, which he delivered to four porters, sent to him by the persons concerned. But though the woman, who came to Edwards's without a mask, and some of the porters, were found out, and taken up, yet it was impossible to carry on the discovery any farther; which gave occasion to a Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Pooley, to say, "That it was not usual to accuse Members of their House of being concerned in any thing to the prejudice of the Government, without naming their names."

After this, the Commons proceeded with great Pr. H. C. cheerfulness in the dispatch of the public business; and, on the 16th of February, the Queen came to the House of Peers, and gave the Royal assent to several money-bills; after which she made a speech to both Houses, wherein she thanked the Commons in particular, for persisting so great Supplies in so short a time.

On the 23d of the same month, the Commons Pr. H. C. proceeded to take into further consideration the accounts of the revenues and debts, ever since the Queen's Accession to the Crown, and resolved, "That it appeared to this House, that the public revenues granted or arisen, since her Majesty's happy Accession to the Crown, had been duly applied to the advancement of the public Credit, and for the advantage and honour of the Nation."

The Commons went on in creating funds for the Supplies, which they had voted for the next year. And the Nation was so well satisfied with the Government, and the conduct of affairs, that, a fund being created for two millions and a half by way of annuities for ninety-nine years, at six and a half per cent, at the end of which the capital was to sink, the whole sum was subscribed in a very few days. At the same time, the Duke of Marlborough proposed the advance of a sum of five hundred thousand pounds to the Emperor, for the use of Prince Eugene, and the service of Italy, upon a branch of the Emperor's revenue in Silesia at eight per cent, and the capital to be repaid in eight years. The Nation so abounded both in money and zeal, that this was likewise advanced in a very few days. Our Armies, as well as our Allies, were every where punctually paid. The credit of the Nation was never raised so high in any age, nor so sacredly maintained. The Treasury was as exact and as regular in all payments, as any private Banker could be. It is true, a great deal of money went out of the Kingdom in specie. That, which maintained the war in Spain, was to be sent thither in that manner, the way by bills of exchange not being yet opened. The trade with Spain and the West-Indies, marks were made on the men in power. December 19. The Regency-bill, ingrossed from the Lords, intituled, An Act for the better security of her Majesty's Person and Government, and of the Succession to the Crown of England in the Protestant Line, being read a second time; a debate rose thereupon, wherein Charles Caesar Esq; Member for the borough of Hertford, said, among other things, "That there was a noble Lord, without whose advice the Queen did nothing, who, in the late Reign, was known to keep a constant

"correspondence with the Court of St. Germans." This being a severe reflection on the Lord-Treasurer, the words were directed to be set down in writing at the table, upon which Mr. Caesar endeavoured to excuse himself; and being withdrawn, after a short debate, it was resolved, "That the said words were highly dishonourable to her Majesty's Person and Government; and that the said Charles Caesar, Esq; be, for his said offence, committed prisoner to the Tower."

1705-6. Indies, which formerly brought great returns of money, was now stopped. By this means, there grew to be a sensible want of money over the Nation. This was in a great measure supplied by the currency of Exchequer bills and Bank-notes. And this lay so obvious to the disaffected party, that they were often attempting to blast, at least to disparage this paper-credit: But it was still kept up. It raised a just indignation in all, who had a true love to their country, to see some using all possible methods to shake the administration, which, notwithstanding the difficulties at home and abroad, was much the best, that had been in the memory of man, and was certainly not only easy to the subjects in general, but gentle even towards those, who were endeavouring to undermine it.

Complaints of the progress of Popery. On the 27th of February, a petition of the Gentry and Clergy of the South parts of Lancashire, at their monthly meetings, on the 12th, in the borough of Wigan, for suppressing profaneness and immorality, was presented to the House, complaining of several grievances they laboured under from the Priests, Romish Gentry, and Popish Emisaries, and praying for redress and relief. After the reading of this petition, it was unanimously resolved to address the Queen, "that she would be pleased to issue out her Royal proclamation for the putting in execution the laws in force against all such persons, as had or should endeavour to pervert her Majesty's subjects to the Popish Religion." And they ordered, that a bill be brought in for making more effectual the act of the eleventh year of his late Majesty's Reign, for the further preventing the growth of Popery. This bill was accordingly presented the next day by Sir James Montague, and read the first time; and, on the 1st of March, the Commons gave it a second reading, and went through it in a grand Committee. By the act, passed in the latter end of the late Reign*, it was provided, "That all Papists should, within six months, after they had reached the age of eighteen, take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, or declare themselves Protestants; in default whereof, their estates were to go to the next Heirs, being Protestants." Now this clause was so lamely expressed, that the Roman Catholics found two ways to evade it. First, there being in all families a gradation of age among the several Heirs to the same estates, it happened, that though the person, who was come to the age of eighteen, did not take the oaths prescribed by the law, yet the title of Protestant Heir remained undecided, as long as any next Popish Heir was under age. Secondly (and this was the main inconvenience) it lying by that clause upon the next Heir to him, who at the age of eighteen refused to declare himself a Protestant, to prove, that he had not made that declaration, it was impossible for the next Heir to prove such a negative. Now, to make that clause binding and effectual, it was enacted in this bill, "That all Papists and reputed Papists should, within six months after they had reached the age of eighteen, not only declare themselves Protestants, but prove also, that they had made such a declaration." This alarmed all of that Religion, so that they made very powerful (or to follow the raillery of that time) weighty intercessions with the considerable men of the House of Commons. The Court looked on, 1705-6. and seemed indifferent in the matter; yet it was given out, that so severe a law would be very unreasonable, when the Nation was in alliance with so many Princes of that Religion; and that it must lessen the force of the Queen's intercession in favour of the Protestants, who lived in the dominions of those Princes. The proceeding seemed rigorous, and not suited to the gentleness, which the Christian Religion so particularly recommended, and was contrary to the maxims of Liberty of Conscience and Toleration, that were then in great vogue. It was answered, that the dependence of those of that Religion on a foreign jurisdiction, and at present on a foreign Pretender to the Crown, put them out of the case of other subjects, who might differ from the established Religion, since there seemed to be good reason to consider them as enemies rather than as subjects. But the application was made in so effectual a manner, that the bill was let fall; for, on the 2d of March, when Sir James Montague was to report to the House the amendments made to the bill by the grand Committee, the Duke of Norfolk, the chief among the Roman Catholics in England, petitioned, "That he might be heard by his Council for explanation of some words in the bill, and for such relief to him, as to the House should seem meet." Upon the reading of this petition, the Commons ordered, that the Duke of Norfolk be heard by his Council, as to the property in the office of Earl-Marshal of England only. But, his Council not being then ready, the House heard Sir James Montague's report, and then ordered the bill, with the amendments, to be ingrossed. Two days after, the bill was read the third time, and several other amendments were made to it; after which the question was put, That the bill do pass? This occasioned a great debate, wherein Colonel Godfrey, Mr. Boscawen, and Mr. Affil endeavoured to shew the injustice of such a law, urging, that, besides the offence it would give to the Roman Catholic Princes in alliance with the Nation, it would look as if they approved the persecution exercised by the French King and other Catholic Princes against their Protestant subjects. At last the bill was rejected by a majority of one hundred and nineteen against forty-three. And, though the Lords had made some steps towards such a bill, yet since they saw what fate it was like to have in the House of Commons, instead of proceeding further in it, they dismissed that matter with an address to the Queen, on the 14th of March, "That a more watchful eye should be had over the British Priests and Papists for the future; and, for that purpose, that a distinct and particular account should be taken of all Papists and reputed Papists in the Kingdom, with their respective qualities, estates, and places of abode; and that the several accounts of these inquiries be laid before their House at the next Session of Parliament." To this address the Queen answered, "That she was fully convinced, that the insolent behaviour of the Papists had made what their Lordships advised necessary to be done for the safety of her person and government, and the welfare of her People; and that she would give the necessary orders for every thing their Lordships desired."

*A design for a public library.
Burnet.*

There was a project set on foot at this time by the Lord Hallifax, for putting the Records and public Offices of the Kingdom in better order. He had, in a former Session, moved the Lords to send some of their number to view the records in the Tower, which were in great disorder, and in a visible decay, for want of some more Officers, and by the neglect of those employed. The Lords, in their report, proposed some regulations for the future, which have been since followed so effectually (tho' at a considerable charge, by creating several new Officers) that the Nation has reaped the benefit of all this very sensibly. But Lord Hallifax carried this project much farther. The famous library, collected by Sir Robert Cotton, and continued down in his family, was perhaps the greatest collection of manuscripts relating to the public, that any Nation in Europe could shew. The late owner of it, Sir John Cotton, had by his will left it to the public, but in such words, that it was rather shut up, than made any way useful; and, indeed, it was to be so carefully preserved, that none could be the better for it. Lord Hallifax therefore moved the House of Lords to intreat the Queen, that she would be pleased to buy Cotton-House, which stood just between the two houses of Parliament; since some part of that ground would furnish them with many useful rooms, and there would be enough left for building a noble structure for a library; to which, besides the Cotton library and the Queen's library, the Royal Society, who had a very good one at Gresham College, would remove, and keep their assemblies there, as soon as it was made convenient for them. This was a great design, which that Lord, who first set it on foot, seemed resolved to carry on till it was finished. Had that been done, it would have been of great advantage to the Learned World, as well as an honour to the Queen's Reign.

The Lord Sommers likewise made a motion

*A bill to regulate proceedings

in the House of Lords, to correct some of the proceedings in the Common Law and in Chancery, which were both dilatory and very chargeable. He began the motion with some instances, that were more conspicuous and gross; and he managed the matter so, that both the Lord-Keeper and Judges concurred with him, though it passes generally for a maxim, that Judges ought rather to enlarge than contract their jurisdiction. A bill passed the House of Lords, which began a reformation of proceedings at law; but, when it went through the Commons, it was visible, that the interest of Under-officers, Clerks, and Attornies, whose gains were to be lessened by this bill, was more considered, than the interest of the Nation itself. Several clauses, how beneficial soever to the Subject, which touched on their profit, were left out by the Commons. But, what fault soever the Lords might have found with these alterations, yet, to avoid all disputes with the Commons, they agreed to their amendments.

There was another general complaint made of the private acts of Parliament, that passed thro' both Houses too easily, and in so great a number, that it took up a great part of the Session to examine them, even in that cursory way, that was subject to many inconveniences. The fees, that were paid for these to the Speakers and Clerks of both Houses, inclined them to favour and promote them. The Lord Sommers therefore proposed a proper regulation in that matter. The Lord-Keeper Cowper did indeed very generously obstruct those private bills, as much as his predecessor Wright had promoted them. He did another thing of a great example: On the first day of the year, it became a custom for all those, who practised in Chancery, to offer a new-years gift to the Lord, who had the Great-Seal. These grew to be so considerable, that they amounted to fifteen hundred pounds a year. On the New-year's day of this year, which was his first, he signified to all those, who, according to custom, were expected to come with their presents,

(1) On the 2d of March, the Lords read a petition of Joseph Boone, Merchant, in behalf of himself and many other inhabitants of the Province of Carolina, and London Merchants trading thither: Upon which, the Lord Granville, Palatine of the Province of Carolina, having desired to be heard by his Council, the same was granted, and the further debate of this affair put off till the 9th of that month. Their Lordships, having then heard what the Lord Granville's Council had to offer in his behalf, came to these two resolutions: First, "That it is the opinion of this House, that the act of the Assembly of Carolina lately passed there, and since signed and sealed by John Lord Granville, Palatine, for himself and for the Lord Carteret, and the Lord Craven, and by Sir John Colleton, four of the Proprietors of that province, in order to the ratifying of an act, intitled, an act for the establishment of religious worship in this province, according to the Church of England, and for the erecting of Churches for the public worship of God, and also for the maintenance of Ministers, and the building convenient houses for them, so far forth as the same relates to the establishing a Commission for the displacing the Rectors or Ministers of the Churches there, is not warranted by the Charter granted to the Proprietors of that colony, as being not consonant to reason, repugnant to the laws of this Realm, and destructive to the constitution of the Church of England." Secondly, "That it is the opinion of this House, that the act of Assembly "in Carolina, intitled, an act for the more effectual preservation of the Government of this province, by requiring all persons, that shall hereafter be chosen Members of the Commons House of Assembly, and sit in the same, to take the oaths, and subscribe the declaration appointed by this act, and to conform to the religious worship in this province, according to the Church of England, to receive the Sacrament of the Lord's-Supper, according to the rites and usage of the said Church, lately passed there, and signed and sealed by John Lord Granville, Palatine, for himself and the Lord Craven, and also for the Lord Carteret, and by Sir John Colleton, four of the Proprietors of that province, in order to the ratifying of it, is founded upon falsity in matter of fact, is repugnant to the laws of England, contrary to the Charter granted to the Proprietors of that colony, is an encouragement to Atheism and Irreligion, is destructive to trade, and tends to the depopulating and ruining the said province." These resolutions being laid before the Queen in an address, wherein their Lordships "besought her Majesty to deliver the said province from the arbitrary oppressions, under which they lay, and to order the Authors thereof to be prosecuted according to law;" the Queen told them, "That she was very sensible of what great consequence the Plantations were to England; and she would do all in her power to relieve her subjects in Carolina, and to protect them in their just rights." P. R. H. L. II.

(1) There

1705-6. presents, that he would receive none, but would break that custom. He thought it looked like the insinuating themselves into the favour of the Court; and that, if it was not bribery, yet it came too near it, and looked too like it. This contributed not a little to the raising his character; and he managed the Court of Chancery with impartial justice and great dispatch, and was very useful to the House of Lords in the promoting of business. (1).

The Parliament is prorogued.

On the 19th of March the Queen came to the House of Peers, and having given the Royal assent to seventeen public acts, and fifty-three private ones, she made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's speech at the close of the first Session of her second Parliament.
Pr. H. C. III. 473.

"BEING now come to a close of this Session, I am to return you my thanks for having brought it so speedily to a good conclusion, especially for the wife and effectual provision made to secure the Protestant Succession in this Kingdom, and the great advances on your part, towards procuring the like Settlement in the Kingdom of Scotland, and a happy Union of both Nations.

"I am very well pleased likewise with the steps you have made for the amendment of the law, and the better advancement of justice.

"I must again repeat to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that I am extremely sensible of the dispatch you have given to the public Supplies. I assure you, I will be very careful, that they may be applied in the most effectual manner for our common interest.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"At the opening of this Parliament, I recommended, with great earnestness, an intire union of minds and affections among all my subjects, and a sincere endeavour to avoid and extinguish all occasions of divisions and animosity. I am much pleased to find, how in-1705-6. tirely your sentiments have agreed with mine. Your unanimity and zeal, which I have observed, with great satisfaction, throughout this whole Session, against every thing, that tends towards sedition, doth so much discourage all such attempts for the future, and hath set such an example to the whole Kingdom, that, when you are returned into your several Countries, I doubt not but you will find the effects of it every where; and I assure myself you will make it your business and care to improve and perfect that good work you have so far advanced here; and by continuing to shew a just dislike of all factions and turbulent proceedings, and resolving to discountenance the encouragers of them, you will soon make the whole Kingdom sensible of the good effect of so prudent and happy a conduct."

Then the Lord-Keeper prorogued the Parliament to the 21st of May following.

Thus this Session of Parliament came to a very happy conclusion. There was in it the best harmony within both Houses, and between them, as well as with the Crown; and it was the best that ever was in the City of London, over the whole Nation, and indeed over all Europe, of any Session of those times. And when it was considered, that this was the first of the three, so that there were to be two other Sessions of the same Members, it gave an universal satisfaction, both to the People at home, and our Allies abroad, and afforded a prospect of a happy end, that would be put to this devouring war, in all probability, before the conclusion of the Parliament. This gave an inexpressible satisfaction to all, who loved their Country and Religion, and who now hoped, that there was in view a good and safe peace.

With the new Parliament, a new Convocation also met at St. Paul's, October 15. The Latin sermon was preached by Dr. Stanhope, but Dr. Binks carried it from him for Prolocutor, and was presented by the Dean of Christ-Church. This Convocation was chosen as the former had been,

(1) There were also some regulations made this Session about seamen, which were inserted in a bill for the encouragement and increase of seamen. This bill was brought in, because about twelve thousand sailors were wanted at this time to man the fleet, and was perfected and passed both Houses in four days. The resolutions in the bill were as follow: 1. That, in order to the speedy and more compleat manning of her Majesty's navy for the year 1706, the Justices of the Peace and other Civil Magistrates throughout the several Counties, Ridings, Cities, Towns, and Places, within the Kingdom of England, Dominion of Wales, and Town of Berwick upon Tweed, be impowered and directed forthwith to make, or cause to be made, strict and diligent search for all such seamen, or sea-faring men, as lie hid, and are not in her Majesty's service. 2. That the Justices, and other Civil Magistrates, do take up, send, conduct, and convey, all such seamen or sea-faring men, to be delivered to such persons, as shall be appointed to receive the same. 3. That a penalty be inflicted upon every person, who shall presume to harbour or conceal such seamen or sea-faring men. 4. That a reward be given to every person, who shall discover and take up such seamen or sea-faring men, as aforesaid, the same to be distributed and paid to every such discoverer or person, so taking up such seamen or sea-faring men respectively, out of the money given for the service of the navy. 5. That conduct-money be allowed for conveying and subsisting such seamen and sea-faring men, according to the present usage of the navy. 6. That, for the encouragement of the service, every seaman, who shall be turned over from one ship to another, shall be paid his wages, which shall appear to be due to him in the ship, from which he was turned over, before such ship, to which he shall be turned over, do go to sea, either in money, or by a ticket, which shall intitle him to an immediate payment. 7. That such able-bodied landmen, who are liable to be raised for the recruiting her Majesty's land-forces and marines, be raised for the service, in the like manner, and delivered to such persons, who shall be appointed to receive the same. And they ordered, that the Committee, to whom the bill, for the encouragement and increase of seamen, and for the better and speedier manning her Majesty's fleet, and for making provision for the widows and orphans of all such, as shall be slain or drowned in her Majesty's service, and for the support of trade, was committed, have power to receive a clause or clauses pursuant to these resolutions: And that it be an instruction to the Committee, that they have power to receive a clause for discharging of such seamen, and other insolvent persons, as are in prison for debt, and delivering them into her Majesty's service on board the fleet.

1705-6. been, and the Members, that were ill-affected, were still prevailed on to come up, and to continue in an expensive, but useless attendance in town. The Upper House soon agreed in an address to the Queen, containing humble thanks for her affectionate care for the Church of England, as established by law, from her first accession to the Throne to this day. And then they added thus, by way of harmony with the two Houses of Parliament: "We are exceedingly grieved, that any of your subjects should be so ungrateful and unworthy, as once to suggest, that our Church can be in danger, for want of such support and encouragement in your Majesty's Reign, as may make it flourish in your own time, and leave it secure after you. And, although it is no new thing for designing men to prostitute the venerable name of the Church to the service of their own private ends, yet we think it very strange, that any should be found so extremely weak and undutiful as to be deluded by these groundless clamours, when they have been so often and so publicly confuted by your Royal word and actions; and when the happy state of the Church of England is so much observed and esteemed abroad, that several of the foreign Churches are endeavouring to accommodate themselves to our Liturgy and Constitution. To insinuate that the Church is in danger under these circumstances, and against all the testimonies and assurances of your Royal care and protection, can proceed from nothing but prejudice, interest, and ambition. We humbly crave leave to express our just resentment of the indignity of all such suggestions, not only as false and groundless in themselves, but chiefly as they are dishonourable reflections upon your Royal promises for the support of the Church, and upon your Princely wisdom in chusing the most proper and effectual measures to that end. We beg leave also, in a deep sense of your Majesty's goodness, and an intire dependence upon your Royal word, to express our great joy and satisfaction in the flourishing condition of the Church under your most auspicious Government. We are sure it will always be in your will to support and protect it; and that the distractions, which these groundless jealousies are intended to raise, may never put it out of your power, we promise to use our utmost endeavours to discountenance them, and, in our several stations, to defend and preserve inviolably, so far as in us lies, the doctrine, discipline, and worship of our Church, as by law established; and to promote peace and unity amongst your subjects; praying earnestly for your Majesty's long and prosperous Reign over us; as, under the divine providence, the greatest blessing and security that either Church or State can enjoy."

When this address was communicated to the Lower House, they refused to join in it, but would give no reason for their refusal, and the majority carried it for drawing up one of their own. A Committee was appointed, and the Dean of Christ Church, at their next meeting, reported an wholly new form, which contained thanks to her Majesty for her great zeal for the Church, and tender affection to it, but expressed not that full satisfaction as to the safety of the Church, and that indignation against such as represented her to be in danger, as appeared in that which came down from the Upper House. This new address was carried up by the Prolocutor, November 19. The Archbishop made answer in writing, that they could not receive their address, but required them to go back to their House, and consider the address sent down to them, and either agree to it, or bring up their exceptions against it in writing.

Some of the Lower House, when they returned, were for doing this: But the majority in two meetings agreed, that such notice be taken of those words in the message from the Upper House, We cannot receive the address you have offered to us, as to affirm, and effectually assert their right, of having what they offered to the Upper House received by his Grace and their Lordships: That it was proper for the House in their answer to say, that they conceived their Lordships refusal was an infringement of that right: That it is not a necessary duty of the Lower House to re-consider, when their Lordships require it, what they have declared to their Lordships they have maturely considered, and cannot join in it. That the Lower House, notwithstanding their Lordships expectation, expressed in their message, was still at liberty to disagree, without offering their exceptions: However, they agreed to re-consider the address of the Lords, and to lay before them the substance of the resolutions foregoing. They also agreed, not to depart from their former resolution of not joining with their Lordships in their address; and afterwards, not to carry up any exceptions to their Lordships address; but to signify to them, that it is the undoubted right of the Lower House to have the paper they presented received by their Lordships, and that they hoped they would be satisfied upon perusing it: And that the Lower House intirely considered in her Majesty's zeal for the Church of England, and an hearty detestation of all persons, that should endeavour to raise any jealousies concerning it. And, pursuant to these resolutions, a paper was carried from the Lower to the Upper House, on December 1.

The Lower House thus refusing, either to agree to the address, or to offer their objections, the address was let fall; and upon that a stop was put to all further communication between the two Houses. The Lower House went on in their former practice of intermediate Sessions, in which they began to enter upon business, to approve of some books, and to censure others; and they resolved to proceed upon the same grounds, that factious men among them had before set up, though the falshood of their pretensions had been evidently made to appear. On December 16, the Dean of Peterborough protested against the irregularities of the Lower House: And particularly against the Prolocutor's proroguing the House by the authority of the House itself: The pretending to a power to put the Prolocutor into the chair before he is confirmed by the Archbishop and Bishops: The pretending to a power to give leave to their Members to absent themselves, and substitute proxies: The electing an Actuary in prejudice of the right of the Archbishop: The late disrespectful and undutiful carriage of the House to the Archbishop and Bishops, in refusing their address to her Majesty without making any exceptions. This was signed by above fifty, and the whole body was but an hundred and forty-five. Some were neutral, so that very near one half broke off from the rest, and sate no more 1705-6. with them. The Lower House would not suffer this protestation to be read, and therefore it was carried to the Upper, and entered in their acts.

Whilst the Lower House was deliberating how to vent their indignation against the Protesters, a more sensible mortification ensued. The Archbishop had prorogued them to the 1st of March; by which time the Queen sent a letter to him, dated February 25, signifying her concern, that the differences in Convocation were still kept up, and rather increased than abated: And that she was the more surprized, because it had been her constant care and endeavour to preserve the Constitution of the Church of England, as by law established, and to discountenance all divisions and innovations whatsoever: Declaring she was resolved to maintain her supremacy, and the due subordination of Presbyters to Bishops, as fundamental parts thereof; and that she expected, that he and his suffragans should act conformably to his and her resolution: and that, in so doing, they might be assured of the continuance of her favour and protection: And that neither of them should be wanting to any of the Clergy, whilst they were true to the Constitution, and dutiful to her, and their Ecclesiastical Superiors; and preserved such a temper as became all, but especially those who were in Holy Orders: And she required him to communicate this to the Bishops and Clergy; and, on March 1, to prorogue the Convocation to such time as appeared most convenient. On that day the Archbishop sent for the Lower House, and read to them the Queen's letter, with which they were struck, for it had been carried so secretly, that it was a surprize to them all. When they saw they were to be prorogued, they ran indecently to the door, and with some difficulty were kept in the room till the prorogation was intimated to them. They went afterwards to their own House, where, though prorogued, they sat still in form, as if they had been a House, but they did not venture on passing any vote. So factious were they, and so implicitly led by those, who had got an ascendant over them, that, though they had formerly submitted the matters in debate to the Queen, yet now, when she declared her pleasure, they would not acquiesce in it.

Account of the treaty of Union between England and Scotland.
Boyer.

An affair of the utmost consequence was now in agitation. The uniting of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland was ever thought of such importance to the wealth, strength, and tranquillity of the Island of Great-Britain, that several attempts were made towards it, both before and after the Union of the two Crowns, in the person of King James I. of England, and VI. of Scotland; of which attempts it will not be improper to give here a summary view.

King Henry VIII. to bring the Government of the Island under one Monarch, offered his daughter Mary to King James V. of Scotland; and, to prevent all difficulties, that might happen about the Succession after his death, he proposed to make King James Duke of York, and Lord-Lieutenant or Deputy-Governor of England, immediately upon the marriage. The King of Scotland was inclinable enough to fall in with that advantageous proposal; but the French Court and the Popish Clergy, who equally dreaded the effects of such a conjunction, found means to prevent it. This engaged the Scots Nation, against their will, in a war against England, and occasioned the defeat at Solan Moss; which brought their King to his grave, upon an apprehension, that his Nobility had conspired against him.

King Edward VI. pursuing his Father's design of an amicable Union of the two Kingdoms, proposed a match betwixt himself and Queen Mary of Scotland; which had been agreed on in the Scots Parliament in King Henry VIII's time; but the French and Popish faction broke that agreement, and brought upon the Scots another war with England, which ended in their defeat at the battle of Pinky near Musselburg. Notwithstanding this great victory, by which the English became possessed of most of the South of Scotland, yet King Edward and his Council were so far from designing a conquest of Scotland, or the overthrowing of the Constitution of that Kingdom, that his Uncle, the Duke of Somerset, Protector of the Kingdom of England, published a declaration to invite the Scots to amity and equality: "We overcome in war (said that declaration) and offer peace: We win holds, and offer no conquest: We get in your land, and offer England. What can be more offered than intercourse of merchandizes, and interchange of marriages; the abolishing of all such our laws, as prohibit the same, or might be an impediment to the mutual amity? We have offered not only to leave the authority, name, title, right, or challenge of Conqueror; but to receive that, which is the shame of men overcome; to leave the name of the Nation, and the glory of our Victory, and to take the indifferent old name of Britons; because nothing should be left on our part to be offered; nothing on your part unrefused, whereby ye might be inexcusable. What face has this of Conquest? We seek not to disinherit your Queen, but to make her Heirs inheritors also of England. We seek not to take from you your laws nor customs; but we seek to redress your oppression." This was a very generous proposal from a Conqueror; but the Popish French faction still made it ineffectual, and brought Scotland under a yoke of French tyranny; which so much incensed the Scots, that, when they set about the Reformation, they destroyed the Hierarchy from the very foundations, and reduced the Ecclesiastics (who had then one third of the Kingdom in their possession) to their ancient dependence upon the State, as to their maintenance and benefices.

King James I. soon after his Accession to the English Throne, in March 1604, moved the Parliament of England for an Union betwixt the two Kingdoms; "That, as they were made one in the head, so among themselves they might be inseparably conjoined, and all memory of by-past divisions extinguished." The motion seemed at first to be generally well-relished by both Nations, whose respective Parliaments appointed their Commissioners; the English forty-four in number, and the Scots thirty. They met accordingly at Westminster, and agreed upon some articles about repealing all hostile laws made either in England against Scotland, or in Scotland against England; and the mutual communication of trade and commerce; reserving the King's prerogative in the preferment of men to offices and honours in either Kingdom. The King 1705-6, recommended the prosecution of that business to the Parliament of England; but, of all the articles agreed upon by the Commissioners, only that was enacted, which concerned the abolishing of hostile laws. The King was extremely grieved at this; and conceiving, that the work would more easily be effected, if begun in Scotland, called a Parliament there. The Estates, at the King's desire, readily allowed all the articles concluded in the treaty, with a proviso, that the same should, in like manner, be ratified in the Parliament of England; otherwise, the conclusions not to have the force of a law. And it was also declared, "That, if the Union should happen to take effect, the Kingdom, notwithstanding, should remain an absolute and free Monarchy, and the fundamental laws receive no alteration." But, the English Puritans being elated with the hopes they had conceived from an Union of the two Nations, the Church-party grew jealous of them, and, inveighing against the Scots in Parliament, Convocation, and Pulpits, defeated all endeavours to accomplish that Union. They soon discovered King James's foible; and, knowing his inclinations to increase his power, they found out other employment for him, which was to advance his prerogative in Scotland; to the subversion of the liberties of that Kingdom both in Church and State, and concurred with him as heartily in that, as they opposed him in the Union.

In the Reign of King Charles I. we do not find an Union to have been once mentioned; for, the prejudices against the Puritans still increasing, and the Church-party growing powerful at Court, by the promotion of Bishop Laud to the See of Canterbury, an ill-timed and mistaken zeal for the Church of England had so great an ascendancy over that unhappy Prince, as to engage him with more eagerness than his Father to overturn the Constitution, and endeavour a conquest of Scotland; which was one of the fatal causes of all his misfortunes.

Soon after the beginning of the civil wars, there was a League or Confederacy between the two Kingdoms, which continued with various interruptions for some years, till it was entirely broke in 1650; when, a war breaking out between the two Nations, Scotland was reduced to the obedience of the prevailing power of the House of Commons, who styled themselves the Parliament of England. But, though Scotland was reduced, it was thought it could not be so well secured, as by an Union. Accordingly, after the battle of Worcester, the Parliament appointed eight Commissioners to go down to Scotland, and treat with the Estates of that Kingdom of an Union. Twenty of thirty-two Shires, and thirty-five of the then fifty-seven Burroughs, agreed to the Union; and in their Assembly at Edinburgh, about two months after, the rest likewise concurred. Pursuant to this agreement, a bill was prepared, but, before it could be finished, the long Parliament was turned out of doors by Cromwell, which put a stop to the Union. In April 1653, Cromwell took the Government upon him; and, in December following, signed an instrument, whereby, among other things, the Counties, Cities, and Burroughs of England, Scotland, and Ireland, were brought under a new regulation, with respect to their Representatives in Parliament. By this scheme England was to have four hundred Representatives, Scotland thirty, and Ireland thirty. When England was rated at seventy thousand pounds per month, Scotland was to pay six thousand pounds, and Ireland nine thousand pounds, and the share each County and Burrough was to pay of these assessments in 1656, was settled. These assessments were supposed to be about two shillings in the pound, consequently they valued the rents of England at eight millions and four hundred thousand pounds, of Scotland at seven hundred and twenty thousand pounds, and of Ireland at one million and eighty thousand pounds, which valuations are said to have been above two thirds of the real extended values. On the 12th of April 1654, Oliver published an Ordinance for uniting Scotland with England. By this Ordinance the powers of Assemblies, Conventions, and Parliaments in Scotland were taken away, with Wards, Servitudes, and Slavish Tenures. These were abolished in England after the Restoration, but Wards and Liveries were, in 1660, restored again in Scotland. Thus stood the Union for some years, during which, it is said, the Scots Nation was never more easy, nor justice more impartially administered.

At the Restoration, every thing relating to Scotland and Ireland were put upon the same foot as before the Civil wars. The ill effects whereof were soon felt in many instances, particularly by the passing and execution of several negative acts relating to trade, which not only stirred up the old, but raised many new animosities. The Scots made heavy complaints against these impositions and exclusions, but without any redress.

However, in the year 1670, the Parliament of Scotland passed an act, empowering King Charles to grant a Commission under the Great Seal of Scotland for such persons, as he should think fit to name, to treat with Commissioners of England about the Union; but with this proviso, That nothing they agreed upon should stand, except confirmed by the Parliament of Scotland. When the Commissioners met, the King sent them the five following points to be considered, as the subject-matter of the treaty: "1. The preserving to either Kingdom their laws, Civil and Ecclesiastical, intire. 2. The uniting of the two Kingdoms into one Monarchy, under his Majesty, his Heirs, and Successors, inseparable. 3. The reducing both Parliaments into one. 4. The stating of all privileges, as to trade and other advantages. 5. The securing the conditions of the Union." And it was settled, as a preliminary, that, except all was agreed on, no particular thing resolved upon should be binding. When they came to consider the matter, Sir John Nisby, one of the Commissioners for Scotland, a great Lawyer, and the King's Advocate, urged, "That the Union could not be, as proposed in the second and third articles, because they were destructive to the fundamental Government of the Kingdom of Scotland, and tended to take away their Parliaments, which, he said, the Parliament itself could not do; nor were the Commissioners appointed for the treaty empowered to divest the Electors of that power; and alledged an act of Parliament, (8 Jac. 6.) which declared it treason, to attempt the alteration of the Constitution of Parliament. He alledged farther, that King James's 1705-6. "James's Commission to treat was not of that nature, and that his Commission ought to be the rule of the treaty; adding, that, in the Union among the republics of Greece, each republic reserved their Sovereignty." And the Earl of Lauderdale said, "That it was the like among the United-Provinces, the several Kingdoms of Spain, and the thirteen Cantons of Switzerland." Then, as to the Constitution of the Parliament, the Commissioners of Scotland resolutely adhered to it, "That none of the constituent Members of the Parliament of Scotland should be excluded from the Parliament of Great-Britain; for they could not exclude any of those, from whom they had their authority; but agreed, that his Majesty might call together both Parliaments, to consult about the public affairs of the Monarchy." There were also debates among them about appeals to Parliament from Courts of Judicature, whose sentences in Scotland are not questionable but by Parliament; and that it would be an inconsistency, that one part of the Monarchy should be liable to appeals before the Parliament, and the other not. As to the Union of both Kingdoms into one Monarchy, the Scots Commissioners would agree to it on no other terms, but in the posterity of King James VI. in which the English made some difficulty, and thought Heirs and Successors sufficient. But the Scots insisted upon it, and alleged, that, by the 11th of Henry VII. an usurper, being crowned, was reputed lawful Successor in England. Thus the treaty came to nothing (which lasted from the 13th of September to the 14th of November following) the Commissioners, on the part of Scotland, not only insisting upon their old pretences of preserving Sovereignities and Independencies, but likewise, that, by their Constitution, they could not so much as treat of an Union, till the whole Parliament, and even all their Constituents, had consented. And, though at last they offered to try if they could get their countrymen's consent to have the two Parliaments joined, yet they would not abate one of their Members upon any account whatsoever. Thus, though the first motion of a treaty came intirely from themselves, it was the Scots who broke it off. The secret motives of their so doing proceeded (as it is said) from some about the Court (who at first fancied they could increase their power and influence by the Union) being afterwards convinced, it would have quite another effect.

In the time of King James II. there was nothing done in the Union, the Court being sufficiently taken up with other designs. But tho', in the Reign of King William and Queen Mary, both Nations were too much distracted among themselves, and the King and his Ministers too busy about other affairs, to think in earnest of uniting the two Kingdoms; yet, the same being proposed by the Scots Convention of the Estates, who appointed Commissioners to treat upon that matter with England, King William, in his speech to both Houses of Parliament, on the 21st of March 1689-90, recommended to their re-consideration an Union with Scotland. The Parliament took little notice of this recommendation from the Throne; so that no answer was returned to the Scots Parliament; and that business rested till the year 1700, when the King, in his answer to the Lords address against the Scots Settlement at Darien, took that opportunity of putting the House of Peers in mind of what he recommended to his Parliament, soon after his Accession to the Throne: "That they would consider of an Union between the two Kingdoms: That his Majesty was of opinion, that nothing would contribute more to the security and happiness of both; and was inclined to hope, that, after they had lived an hundred years under the same head, some happy expedient might be found for making them one people, in case a treaty were set on foot for that purpose. And therefore he very earnestly recommended that matter to the consideration of the House." Hereupon the Lords framed and passed a bill for authorizing certain Commissioners of the Realm of England to treat with Commissioners of Scotland, for the weal of both Kingdoms. But, the Commons refusing their concurrence to this bill, the business of the Union went no further.

This great work therefore was reserved for the Reign of Queen Anne; for though the negotiation, which was set on foot soon after her Accession to the Throne, unhappily miscarried; yet it was resolved to endeavour again the Union of the two Kingdoms, of which many had quite despaired. And those, who entertained better hopes, thought it must have run out into a long negotiation for many years: But, beyond all men's expectation, it was begun and finished within the compass of one. According to the powers given to the Queen by the Parliaments of England and Scotland, on the 10th of April she appointed the Commissioners on the part of England, the Commissioners on the part of Scotland having been named before, on the 27th of February. Mr. George Dodington was named Secretary by the English, and Sir Daniel Nairne by the Scots Commissioners. The persons who were appointed on the English side were well chosen. They were the most capable of managing the treaty, and the best disposed to it of any in the Kingdom (1). The Scots Commissioners were so strangely chosen, that from thence many 1706. many concluded, that an Union was not sincerely designed by the Ministry, when they saw such a nomination (1). For they were not looked on as men well-affected to the design, most of them having stood out in a long and firm opposition to the Revolution, and to all that had been done afterwards pursuant to it (2). The nomination of these was fixed on by the Dukes of Queensberry and Argyle. It was said by them, that, though these objections did indeed lie against them, yet they had such an interest in Scotland, that engaging them to be cordially for the Union would be a great means to get it agreed to in the Parliament there. The Earl of Stair, who heartily concurred in the design, was thought to have a hand in this piece of policy, in which the event shewed that right measures were taken. The Scots had got among them the notion of a Federal Union, like that of the United Provinces, or the Cantons of Switzerland. But the English resolved to lose no time, in the examining or discussing that project; for this reason, besides many others, that, as long as the two Nations had two different Parliaments, they could break the Union whenever they pleased; for each Nation would follow their own Parliament. The design was now to settle a lasting and firm Union between the Kingdoms; therefore they resolved to treat only about an incorporating Union, that should put an end to all distinctions, and unite all their interests: So they at last entered upon the scheme of an intire Union. 1706.

On Tuesday the 16th of April, the Commissioners of both Kingdoms met, the first time, in the Council-Chamber in the Cock-pit near White-hall, the place appointed for their Conferences; and their Commissions being opened and read by the Secretaries, the Lord-Keeper of England, and, the Lord-Chancellor of Scotland, made introductory speeches; after which it was agreed, that copies of the two Commissions should be prepared and signed by the respective Secretaries, and interchanged against the next meeting, which was put off till the Monday following.

Accordingly, on the 22d of April, they met again, and the Lord-Keeper delivered to the Board the following preliminaries: "I. That all proposals made by either side be made in writing, and every point, when agreed, reduced into writing. II. That no points, though agreed on, and reduced into writing, be obligatory on either side, till all matters be adjusted in such a manner, as will be proper to be laid before the Queen and the two Parliaments for their approbation. III. That there be a Committee appointed, consisting of a certain number of each Commission, to revise the minutes of what passes, which are not to be inserted by the Secretaries in their respective books, but by order of the said Committee, having first made report thereof

(2) Mr. Lockhart, on the other hand, assures us in his Memoirs, p. 186, that all the Commissioners were of the Court or Whig interest, except himself and the Archbishop of York. "This last, as was reported," says he, was named merely out of respect to the dignity of the office he bore, but would not be present so much as once at the treaty. The other, because, being my Lord Wharton's nephew, they expected to carry him off; and, as he was surprized at his being named, so he had no inclination to the employment, and was at first resolved not to have accepted it; but his friends, and those of his party, believing he might be serviceable, by giving an account how matters were carried on, prevailed with him to alter his resolution. But he foreseeing, that several things would occur during the treaty, that were contrary to his principles, as the business of an incorporating Union, and, in consequence thereto, the Succession of the House of Hanover to the Crown; he convened together the Earls of Home and Strathmore, the Viscount of Stourmont, Mr. Cockran of Kilmarnock, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, and Mr. Henry Maule of Kelly, who were the chief instruments of persuading him to attend the treaty; and wrote to the Duke of Hamilton, who was then in Lancashire; and, having communicated to them his difficulties, he desired their advice and direction how he should behave, and particularly, whether or not he should protest and enter his dissent against these measures; being resolved to receive instructions from them, as a warrant for his procedure,

 "livered to the Board the following proposal,
 "That the two Kingdoms of England and Scot-
 "land be for ever united into one Kingdom,
 "by the name of Great-Britain: That the "united Kingdom of Great-Britain be repre"sented by one and the same Parliament; and "that the Succession to the Monarchy of the "united Kingdom of Great-Britain, in case of

 "act of Parliament, made in England in the "12th and 13th years of the Reign of the late "King William, intituled, An act for the further "limitation of the Crown, and the better securing
 "the rights and liberties of the Subject."

After this the Commissioners adjourned to the 24th of the same month, when the Lord-Chan"cellor of Scotland acquainted the Board, that the "Commissioners of Scotland did agree to the pre"liminary articles proposed at the last meeting,
 "for regulating the method of proceeding in this "treaty: And then he delivered to the Board the "following proposals: "1. That the Succession "to the Crown of Scotland, in case of failure
 "of Heirs of her Majesty's body, should be

 "vileges, as Natives of England, in England, "and the Dominions thereunto belonging; and "reciprocally, that the subjects of England en"joy the like rights and privileges in Scotland.
 "3. That there be a free communication and "intercourse of trade and navigation between "the two Kingdoms and Plantations thereunto "belonging, under such regulations, as, in the "progress of this treaty, shall be found most "for the advantage of both Kingdoms. 4. That "all laws and statutes in either Kingdom, con"trary to the terms of this Union, be re"pealed." The Commissioners for England,
 "after a short consultation by themselves, returned
 "an answer, "That they were so fully convinced,
 "that nothing but an intire Union of the two "Kingdoms would settle perfect and lasting "friendship between them, that they therefore "thought fit to decline entering into any fur"ther consideration upon the proposals now "made by the Commissioners for Scotland, as "not tending to that end; and desired, that "the Commissioners for Scotland would give in "their answer to the proposal delivered by the "Commissioners for England, in order to an in-
 "tire Union of both Kingdoms."

The next day the Lord-Chancellor, in the name of the Commissioners for Scotland, deliver"ed to the Board the following answer: "The "Commissi-

"and to justify his conduct. To whom they all un"animously returned this answer, that, if he should "protest, he could not well continue longer to meet "with the other Commissioners; and, if he entered "his dissent, it would render him odious to them;
 "that they would be extremely upon the reserve, so
 "as he would be utterly incapable to learn any thing,
 "that might be useful afterwards in the opposing the "design; whereas, if he fate quiet, and concealed his "opinion as much as possible, they, expecting to per"suade him to leave his old friends and party, would "not be shy, and he might make discoveries of their "designs, and thereby do a singular service to his "Country.

The same Writer afterwards tells us, p. 191. "That
 "the Treasurer of England and Court-party there did "not at first design the treaty of Union should have "gone the length it afterwards did; it being a mighty
 "stroke to the Monarchy, and consequently to them,
 "who advised and directed the Queen in all matters.
 "But the Treasurer, being extremely blamed for al"lowing the Queen to pass the Scots act of Security,
 "and concerning peace and war, into laws, knew
 "the Tories, who only waited for a proper time, de"signed to lay hold on this as an handle, wherewith-
 "al to pull him down; and therefore, to save himself
 "by amusing the English with the hopes of an intire
 "Union, he set this treaty on foot, with a design to "have spun it out so long, as he was in hazard of the "attempts and malice of his enemies. But the Whig-"party joined most sincerely in the measure of an in"corporating Union.—They had somewhat in view
 "besides the general interest and security of England,
 "or establishing the House of Hannover on the two "Thrones of this Island (all Monarchs and race of "Kings being equally odious to them) their design
 "being sooner or later to establish a Commonwealth,
 "or at least to clip the wings of the Royal Prerogative,
 "and to reduce the Monarch to so low an ebb,
 "that his power should not exceed that of a Stadt"holder of Holland, or a Doge of Venice. And it "was plain and obvious such designs could be more "easily executed, when the legislative authority of "Scotland was abrogated, by reducing the Represen"tatives of the Nation to a small and inconsiderable

 "number incorporated with a much greater, and sub"jecting her to the Laws, Regulations, and Govern"ment of another Kingdom, of which they had the "chief direction, than if the Scots Nation and Parlia"ment remained a distinct and independent People
 "and Judicature, and were thereby in a capacity to "assist their Sovereign in maintaining his just rights
 "and prerogatives in that as well as his other King"doms. They remembered how the Scots, in the "Reign of King Charles II. did cast the balance, and "defeat their design of secluding the Duke of York
 "from succeeding to the Crown; and were resolved
 "by this incorporating Union to remove that obstacle "to their future projects and designs. Thus, the "Court and Whig-parties in England agreeing (tho'
 "upon different topics and views at first) in the mea"sure of a treaty of Union betwixt the two King"doms, the latter prevailed to have a plurality of their "own party in both Commissions, particularly the "Scots, who so frankly yielded to the demands of the "English, and prostituted the honour, and surrender"ed the interest of their Country, that the terms of "the treaty proved so advantageous for England, and "destructive to Scotland, that the Treasurer and "Court-party could not, without giving a greater "handle against them, than what they proposed to "evade by this measure, so much as connive at, or "countenance any person, that endeavoured to ob"struct the Union's taking effect. On the other "hand, the Scots Statesmen and Revolutioners were so "sensible of their own guilt in betraying their Coun"try, and acting contrary to its interest these many "years by-past, that they thought themselves in no
 "security from being called to an account for their ac"tions, unless they removed the Parliament, and "rendered the Nation subservient and subject to a "people, whom they had served, and from whom
 "they looked for protection."

1706. " Commissioners for Scotland have considered the proposal given in to them by the Commissioners for England, on Monday the 22d instant; and do agree, that the Kingdoms of Scotland and England be for ever united into one Kingdom, by the name of Great-Britain: That the united Kingdom of Great-Britain be represented by one and the same Parliament: And that the Succession to the Monarchy of the Kingdom of Great Britain, in case of failure of Heirs of her Majesty's body, shall descend upon the most excellent Princesses Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and remain to Her and the Heirs of her body, being Protestants, with this provision, That all the Subjects of the united Kingdom of Great-Britain shall have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation, to and from any part or place within the united Kingdom, and Plantations thereunto belonging; and that there be a communication of all other privileges and advantages, which do or may belong to the subjects of either Kingdom."

After a private consultation, the Lord-Keeper, in the name of the Commissioners for England, delivered to the board this reply, " The Commissioners for England are of opinion, that the provision added by the Commissioners of Scotland, to the proposal made by the Commissioners for England, on the 22d instant, is a necessary consequence of an intire Union; and, therefore, their Lordships do agree to that provision, under such terms, as in the further progress of this treaty shall be found to be for the common advantage of both Kingdoms."

The same day, in pursuance of the third preliminary, a Committee was appointed for revising the minutes; and there were nominated, on the part of England, the Lord Grey; Mr. John Smith, Speaker of the House of Commons; Sir Thomas Trevor, Sir John Cook, and Dr. Waller, or any three of them; and on the part of Scotland, the Earl of Sutherland, the Earl of Leven, the Lord President of the Session, the Lord-Justice-Clerk, John Clark of Pennycook, or any three of them.

Four days after, the Commissioners met again, and the Lord-Keeper delivered to the Board the following proposal: " That there be the same customs, excises, and all other taxes; and the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade throughout the united Kingdom of Great-Britain." Hereupon the Scots Commissioners proposed, " That a Committee be appointed of an equal number of each side, to adjust the several points contained in that proposal; and desired, that the English Commissioners would order the account of the taxes and other things, to be laid before the Committee."

The English Commissioners having proposed to appoint a Committee, to consist of eleven of each side, and of them any six to have power to proceed, and that they should be nominated the next meeting; this was readily agreed to by the Scots; and accordingly, on the 11th of May, the Commissioners proceeded to the nomination of the Committee. The English named the Dukes of Somerſet and Bolton, the Earl of Sunderland, the Lords Townſend, Wharton, and Sommers, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Marquis of Hartington, Mr. Secretary Harley, Mr. Henry Boyle, and Sir Simon Harcourt. The Scots appointed the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Queensberry, the Earls of Sutherland, Leven, and Stair, the Lord Duplin, the Lord President of the Session, the Lord-Justice-Clerk, and Sir Patrick Johnſtown: And it was agreed, that this Committee should meet the next Morning, and have power to adjourn themselves.

On the 21st of May, when the treaty was pretty well advanced, the Queen went to the meeting, and told the Commissioners, " That she was so much concerned for the Union of the two Kingdoms, that she could not satisfy herself without coming, before she went out of town, to see what progress they had made in the treaty, and to recommend very earnestly to them the bringing it to a happy conclusion, with as much dispatch, as the nature of it would admit; not doubting of the general satisfaction, which her subjects of both Kingdoms would receive, in finding them to overcome all difficulties to attain so great and public a good." When she had done speaking, the Lord-Keeper desired to know, if she would hear the proposals, made on either side, and the resolutions taken thereupon, read by the Secretaries; which she allowed of, and then retired.

About a month after, the Queen came again to their meeting, and told the Commissioners, " That she was come thither once more to see what further progress they had made in the treaty, and to press a speedy conclusion of it, in regard her servants of Scotland could not, without great inconveniency, be much longer absent from that Kingdom." Upon this, in the thirty-fifth meeting, on the 28th of June, the English Commissioners proposed, That four Commissioners of each part be appointed to draw up into form the articles of the treaty, upon the points already agreed, or which should afterwards be agreed. To which the Scots Commissioners having consented, the articles were brought to perfection by the 22d of July, when the Commissioners of both Kingdoms signed and sealed the instruments, and ordered, that the respective Secretaries of each Commission should sign each other's Journals of the proceedings, and afterwards enter in the Journals the Articles of the treaty of Union.

The next day, the Commissioners for both Kingdoms went from the Cockpit to attend the Queen at St. James's, where the Lord-Keeper, in the name of the Commissioners for England, presented to her Majesty one of the signed and sealed instruments, containing the Articles of Union, and made the following speech:

May it please your Majesty,

" WE the Commissioners appointed by your Majesty, in pursuance of the act of Parliament passed in your Kingdom of England, to treat concerning an Union of the two Kingdoms, with the Commissioners of Scotland, do (according to our duty) humbly beg leave to present to your Majesty these the effects of our continued and faithful endeavours to that end.

" They are the articles agreed upon between your Commissioners of both Kingdoms, as the “ terms or conditions, upon which the intended Union is to take place, if your Majesty, and the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, shall think fit to approve and confirm the same.

“ In these we have come to an agreement on every point we judged necessary to effect a compleat and lasting Union; and we have endeavoured not to stir into any matter we had reason to think was not so.

“ And although we have unanimously carried this treaty thus far, purely from a conviction, that we have done therein to God, your Majesty, and our Countries good service; yet we are far from thinking, that what we have done, will or ought to be of any weight or authority elsewhere; but do most intirely submit these our labours to the high wisdom of your Majesty and both your Parliaments, to stand or fall by the reason, justice, and public utility, on which they are founded.

“ Your Majesty's Royal presence and seasonable admonitions to us, at the fittest junctures, were (we most thankfully acknowledge) a very great encouragement and assistance to us in the difficulties we met with.

“ Your Majesty's glory is already perfect; and the finishing this work is all that is wanting, to compleat as well as secure the happiness of so great a People as your subjects may now, without any arrogance, pretend to be.

“ May your Majesty live, not only to give sanction to this universal blessing to all your people, but also to see it in a long and prosperous Reign over us the many immediate or near good effects of it. But as for that great and main consequence of it, for which your Majesty is making, by a most gracious and charitable foresight, this only effectual provision; I mean, the continuance of peace and tranquillity in this Island, upon a descent of the Crown, instead of that bloodshed, and destruction which would probably follow upon the fatal division of it;

“ May we be so happy, as never, in our days, to experiment the fitness of these measures your Majesty is now taking for that end; but may late, very late, posterity only in that respect reap the advantage of them.”

Then the Lord-Chancellor of Scotland, in the name of the Commissioners for that Kingdom, presented also to her Majesty one of the signed and sealed instruments of the Articles of Union, on the part of Scotland, with the following speech:

May it please your Majesty,

“ THE Commissioners, appointed by your Majesty for the Kingdom of Scotland to treat of an Union of your two Kingdoms of Scotland and England, have commanded me to return your Majesty their most humble and dutiful acknowledgements for the honour your Majesty has conferred on them, in employing them to negotiate this most important affair, which is of the greatest consequence to all your Majesty's subjects.

“ We have endeavoured to discharge this trust with all fidelity; and are now come humbly to lay before your Majesty the articles and conditions of Union, which we have “ treated of, and agreed upon, and do submit them to your Majesty's Royal consideration. 1706.

“ It is a great satisfaction to us, that, what we have concluded, in this matter, has been done with unanimity. And we must own, that the knowledge we had of your Majesty's great concern for uniting your two Kingdoms, and the earnestness, with which your Majesty has been most graciously pleased to recommend it, hath enabled us to bring this treaty to a happy and speedy conclusion, to the mutual satisfaction of the Commissioners on both sides; and we shall esteem it our greatest happiness, if what we have prepared be acceptable to your Majesty, and ratified by the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, without which what we have done can be of no authority.

“ An Union of the two Kingdoms has been long wished for, it being so necessary for establishing the lasting peace, happiness, and prosperity of both Nations. And though it has been frequently endeavoured by your Majesty's Royal Predecessors without the desired success; yet the glorious successes, with which God has blessed your Majesty's endeavours for the happiness of your people, make us hope, that this great work is reserved to be accomplished in your Majesty's Reign.”

After which the Queen was pleased to make the following speech:

My Lords,

“ I Give you many thanks for the great pains you have taken in this treaty, and am very well pleased to find your endeavours and applications have brought it to so good a conclusion. The particulars of it seem so reasonable, that I hope they will meet with approbation in the Parliaments of both Kingdoms: I with therefore, that my servants of Scotland may lose no time in going down to propose it to my subjects of that Kingdom: And I shall always look upon it as a particular happiness, if this Union (which will be so great a security and advantage to both Kingdoms) can be accomplished in my Reign.”

The same day, the Queen being in Council, an order was made, importing, “ That whosoever should be concerned in any seditious discourse, or libel, or laying wagers relating to the Union, should be prosecuted, for such their offences, according to the utmost rigour of the law.”

The Lord Sommers had the chief hand in projecting this scheme of the Union, into which all the Commissioners of the English Nation went very easily. The advantages, that were offered to Scotland in the whole frame of it, were so great and so visible, that nothing but the consideration of the safety, that was to be procured by it to England, could have brought the English to agree to a project, that, in every branch of it, was much more favourable to the Scots Nation. The Scots were to bear less, than the fortieth part of the public taxes. When four shillings in the pound were levied in England, amounting to two millions, Scotland was only to be taxed at forty-eight thousand pounds, which was eight months assessment of the fix thousand

1706. thousand pounds which they had been accustomed for some years to pay, and which, they said, was all that the Nation could bear. It is held a maxim, that, in the framing of a Government, a proportion ought to be observed between the share in the Legislature, and the burden to be borne. Yet, in return of the fortieth part of the burden, the Scots were offered near the eleventh part of the Legislature. For the Peers of Scotland were to be represented by sixteen Peers in the House of Lords; and the Commons, by forty-five Members in the House of Commons; and these were to be chosen, according to the methods to be settled in the Parliament of Scotland. And since Scotland was to pay customs and excises on the same foot with England, and was to bear a share in paying much of the debt, which England had contracted during the war; three hundred and ninety-eight thousand pounds was to be raised in England, and sent into Scotland, as an equivalent for that; and this was to be applied to the redeeming the money, that all might be of one denomination and standard; and to the payment of the publick debts of Scotland, and repaying to their African Company all their losses with interest; upon which that Company was to be dissolved; and the overplus of the equivalent was to be applied to the encouragement of manufactures. Trade was to be free all over the Island, and to the Plantations; private rights were to be preserved; and the Judicatories and Laws of Scotland were still to be continued. But all was put, for the future, under the regulation of the Parliament of Great-Britain; the two Nations now were to be one Kingdom, under the same Succession to the Crown, and united in one Parliament. There was no provision made in this treaty with relation to Religion; for in the acts of Parliament in both Kingdoms, which empowered the Queen to name Commissioners, there was an express limitation, that they should not treat of those matters.

This was the substance of the articles of the treaty, which, when they came to be laid before the Parliament of Scotland, met with great opposition, as will hereafter appear (r.) It is time now to return to the operations of the war.

The

(r.) As the Articles of Union will be often referred to, it will be proper to insert them at large.

I. That the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland shall, upon the first day of May, which shall be in the year 1707, and for ever after, be united into one Kingdom, by the name of GREAT-BRITAIN; and that the Ensigns Armorial of the said United Kingdom be such as her Majesty shall appoint; and the Crosses of St. George and St. Andrew be conjoined in such manner as her Majesty shall think fit, and used in all Flags, Banners, Standards, and Ensigns, both at sea and land.

II. That the Succession to the Monarchy of the United Kingdom of Great-Britain, and of the Dominions thereunto belonging, after her most Sacred Majesty, and in default of issue of her Majesty, be, remain, and continue to the most excellent Princess SOPHIA, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and the Heirs of her Body, being Protestants, upon whom the Crown of England is settled, by an act of Parliament made in England, in the twelfth year of the Reign of his late Majesty King William the Third, intituled, An act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject. And that all Papists, and persons marrying Papists, shall be excluded from, and for ever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the Imperial Crown of Great-Britain, and the Dominions thereunto belonging, or any part thereof: And, in every such case, the Crown and Government shall from time to time descend to, and be enjoyed by such person, being a Protestant, as should have inherited and enjoyed the same, in case such Papists, or person marrying a papist, was naturally dead, according to the provision for the descent of the Crown of England, made by another act of Parliament in England, in the first year of the Reign of their late Majesties King William and Queen Mary, intituled, An act declaring the rights and liberties of the subjects, and settling the Succession of the Crown.

III. That the United Kingdom of Great-Britain be represented by one and the same Parliament, to be styled the Parliament of Great-Britain.

IV. That all the subjects of the United Kingdom of Great-Britain shall, from and after the Union, have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation, to and from any port or place within the said United Kingdom, and the dominions and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges, and advantages, which do, or may belong to the subjects of either Kingdom, except where it is otherwise expressly agreed in these articles.

Numb. XLVIII. VOL. III.

V. That all ships or vessels belonging to her Majesty's subjects of Scotland, at the time of ratifying the treaty of Union of the two Kingdoms in the Parliament of Scotland, though foreign built, be deemed and pass as ships of the build of Great-Britain; the owners, or where there are more owners, one or more of the owners, within twelve months, after the first of May next, making oath, that, at the time of ratifying the treaty of Union in the Parliament of Scotland, the same did, in whole or in part, belong to him or them, or to some other subject or subjects of Scotland, to be particularly named, with the place of their respective abodes; and that the same doth then, at the time of the said deposition, wholly belong to him or them; and that no Foreigner, directly or indirectly, hath any share, part, or interest therein: Which oath shall be made before the chief Officer or Officers of the Customs in the port next to the abode of the said owner or owners: And the said Officer, or Officers, shall be empowered to administer the said oath; and the oath, being so administered, shall be attested by the Officer, or Officers, who administered the same: And, being registered by the said Officer or Officers, shall be delivered to the master of the ship, for security of her navigation, and a duplicate thereof shall be transmitted by the said Officer, or Officers, to the chief Officer or Officers of the customs, in the port of Edinburgh, to be there entered in a register, and from thence to be sent to the port of London, to be there entered in the general register of all trading ships belonging to Great-Britain.

VI. That all parts of the United Kingdom, for ever, from and after the Union, shall have the same allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks, and be under the same prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade, and liable to the same customs and duties on import and export. And that the allowances, encouragements, and drawbacks, prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade, and the customs and duties on import and export settled in England, when the Union commences, shall, from and after the Union, take place throughout the whole United Kingdom: Excepting and reserving the duties upon export and import of such particular commodities, from which any persons, the subjects of either Kingdoms, are especially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the Union, are to remain safe and intire to them in all respects as before the same. And that, from and after the Union, no Scots cattle carried into England shall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private accounts, than those duties, to which the cattle of England are or shall be liable within the said Kingdom. And seeing by the laws of England there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain

The French seemed to have laid the design of their campaign so well, that it had every where a formidable appearance: And, if the execution had answered their scheme, it would have proved as glorious, as it was, in the conclusion, fatal to them. They reckoned the taking of Barcelona and Turin sure; and, by that means, they thought the war, both in Spain and Italy, would be soon brought to an end. They knew they should be superior to any force, the Prince of Baden could bring together, on the Upper Rhine; and they intended to have a great army in Flanders, where they knew our chief strength would be, to act as occasion or their other affairs should require. But, how well soever their schemes might seem to be laid, they all proved unsuccessful, and the events, as will be seen, happened quite contrary to all their views.

The Duke of Marlborough arrived at the Hague the 25th of April, N. S. and, continuing there certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded are not expressed, that, from and after the Union, when oats shall be sold at fifteen shillings Sterling per quarter, or under, there shall be paid two shillings and six-pence Sterling for every quarter of the oatmeal exported, in the term of the law, whereby, and so long as, rewards are granted for exportation of other grain; and that the beer of Scotland have the same rewards as barley: And in respect the importation of victuals into Scotland, from any place beyond sea, would prove a discouragement to tillage, therefore that the prohibition, as now in force by the law of Scotland, against importation of victuals from Ireland, or any other place beyond sea into Scotland, do, after the Union, remain in the same force as now it is, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the Parliament of Great-Britain for discouraging the importation of the said victuals from beyond sea.

VII. That all parts of the United Kingdom be for ever, from and after the Union, liable to the same excises upon all excisable liquors, excepting only, that the thirty-four gallons English barrel of beer or ale, amounting to twelve gallons Scots present measure, sold in Scotland by the Brewer at nine shillings and six-pence Sterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailers profit, at two-pence the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not, after the Union, liable on account of the present excise upon excisable liquors in England to any higher imposition than two shillings Sterling upon the aforesaid thirty-four gallons English barrel, being twelve gallons of the present Scots measure. And that the excise settled in England on all other liquors, when the Union commences, take place throughout the whole United Kingdom.

VIII. That, from and after the Union, all foreign salt, which shall be imported into Scotland, shall be charged, at the importation there, with the same duties as the like salt is now charged with being imported into England, and to be levied and secured in the same manner. But, in regard the duties on great quantities of foreign salt imported may be very heavy on the Merchants Importers, that therefore all foreign salt, imported into Scotland, shall be cellared and locked up under the custody of the Merchants Importers, and the Officers employed for levying the duties upon salt; and that the Merchant may have what quantities thereof his occasions require, not under a weigh or forty bushels at a time, giving security for the duty of what quantity he receives, payable in six months. But Scotland shall, for the space of seven years from the said Union, be exempted from paying in Scotland, for salt made there, the duty or excise now payable for salt made in England; but, from the expiration of the said seven years, shall be subject and liable to the same duties for salt made in Scotland, as shall be then payable for salt made in England, to be levied and secured in the same manner, and with proportionable drawbacks and allowances, as in England; with this exception, that Scotland shall, after the said seven years, remain exempted from the duty of two shillings and four pence the bushel on home salt, imposed by an act made in England in the ninth and tenth of King William the Third of England. And, if the Parliament of Great-Britain shall, at, or before the expiring of the said seven years, substitute any other fund in place of the said two shillings and four pence of excise on the bushel of home salt, Scotland shall, after the said seven years, bear a proportion of the said fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this treaty. And that, during the said seven years, there shall be paid in England for all salt made in Scotland, and imported from thence into England, the same duties upon the importation, as shall be payable for salt made in England, to be levied and secured in the same manner as the duties on foreign salt are to be levied and secured in England. And that, after the said seven years, as long as the said duty of two shillings and four pence a bushel upon salt is continued in England, the said two shillings and four pence a bushel shall be payable for all salt made in Scotland, and imported into England, to be levied and secured in the same manner; and that, during the continuance of the duty of two shillings and four pence a bushel upon salt made in England, no salt whatsoever be brought from Scotland to England by land in any manner, under the penalty of forfeiting the salt and the cattle and carriages made use of in bringing the same, and paying twenty shillings for every bushel of such salt, and proportionably for a greater or lesser quantity, for which the carrier, as well as the owner, shall be liable, jointly and severally, and the persons bringing or carrying the same, to be imprisoned by any one Justice of the Peace, by the space of six months, without bail, and until the penalty be paid. And, for establishing an equality in trade, that all salt, exported from Scotland to England, and put on board in Scotland to be exported to parts beyond the seas, and provision for ships in Scotland, and for foreign voyages, may be salted with Scots salt, paying the same duty for what salt is so employed, as the like quantity of such salt pays in England, and under the same penalties, forfeitures, and provisions, for preventing of frauds, as are mentioned in the laws of England. And that, from and after the Union, the laws and acts of Parliament in Scotland for pining, curing, and packing of herrings, white fish, and salmon for exportation, with foreign salt only, without any mixture of British or Irish salt, and for preventing of frauds, and curing and packing of fish, be continued in force in Scotland, subject to such alterations as shall be made by the Parliament of Great-Britain; and that all fish exported from Scotland to parts beyond the seas, which shall be cured with foreign salt only, and without mixture of British or Irish salt, shall have the same easies, premiums, and drawbacks, as are or shall be allowed to such persons as export the like fish from England: And that, for encouragement of the herring-fishing, there shall be allowed and paid to the subjects, inhabitants of Great-Britain, during the present allowances for other fishes, ten shillings and five pence Sterling for every barrel of white herrings, which shall be exported from Scotland; and that they shall be allowed five shillings Sterling for every barrel of beef or pork salted with foreign salt, without mixture of British or Irish salt, and exported for sale from Scotland to parts beyond sea, alterable by the Parliament of Great-Britain. And, if any matters of frauds, relating to the said duties on salt, shall hereafter appear, which are not sufficiently provided against by this article, the same shall be subject to such further provisions as shall be thought fit by the Parliament of Great-Britain.

IX. That whenever the sum of one million, nine hundred and ninety-seven thousand, seven hundred and sixty-three pounds, eight shillings, and four pence half-penny, shall be enacted by the Parliament of Great-Britain, to be raised in that part of the United Kingdom

1706. there till the 9th of May, had repeated Conferences with the Deputies of the States and their Generals, upon the necessary measures to be taken for opening the campaign. The Duke, with Monsieur Auverquerque, came to Masfricht on the 12th of May, and the next day they reviewed the army; and, on the 21st, the English troops joined the Dutch between Borchloen and Groes-Waren. The Confederate army then consisted of seventy-four battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty-three squadrons of horse and dragoons, having with them an hundred cannon, twenty howitzers, and forty-two pontoons.

The Court of France, in the mean time, had information, that the Confederate army in the Netherlands was not yet compleat; that the Danes refused to stir from their quarters till their arrears were paid; and that the Prussians, for other reasons, were yet so far behind, that they could not join the Duke of Marborough in several weeks. It was said, that the French King had Pensioners in the Courts of Denmark and Prussia, who had promised him to use their utmost Designs and motions of the French.

dom now called England, on land and other things usually charged in acts of Parliament there, for granting an aid to the Crown by a land-tax; that part of the United Kingdom, now called Scotland, shall be charged by the same act with the further sum of forty-eight thousand pounds free of all charges, as the quota of Scotland to such tax, and so proportionably for any greater or lesser sum raised in England by any tax on land, and other things usually charged, together with the land: And that such quota for Scotland, in the cases aforesaid, be raised and collected in the same manner as the cels now is in Scotland, but subject to such regulations in the manner of collecting as shall be made by the Parliament of Great-Britain.

X. That during the continuance of the respective duties on stamped paper, vellum, and parchment, by the several acts now in force in England, Scotland shall not be charged with the same respective duties.

XI. That, during the continuance of the duties payable in England on windows and lights, which determines on the first day of August 1710, Scotland shall not be charged with the same duties.

XII. That, during the continuance of the duties payable in England, on coals, culm, and cynders, which determines the thirtieth day of September 1710, Scotland shall not be charged therewith for coals, culm, and cynders consumed there, but shall be charged with the same duties as in England for all coals, culm, and cynders not consumed in Scotland.

XIII. That, during the continuance of the duty payable in England on malt, which determines the twenty-fourth day of June 1707, Scotland shall not be charged with that duty.

XIV. That the Kingdom of Scotland be not charged with any other duties laid on by the Parliament of England before the Union, except these consented to in this treaty; in regard it is agreed, That all necessary provision shall be made by the Parliament of Scotland for the public charge and service of that Kingdom for the year 1707. Provided nevertheless, That if the Parliament of England shall think fit to lay any further impositions by way of customs, or such excises, with which, by virtue of this treaty, Scotland is to be charged equally with England; in such case Scotland shall be liable to the same customs and excises, and have an equivalent to be settled by the Parliament of Great-Britain, with this further provision, That any malt to be made and consumed in that part of the United Kingdom, now called Scotland, shall not be charged with any imposition on malt, during this present war. And seeing it cannot be supposed, that the Parliament of Great-Britain will ever lay any sort of burthens upon the United Kingdom, but what they shall find of necessity at that time for the preservation and good of the whole, and with due regard to the circumstances and abilities of every part of the United Kingdom; therefore it is agreed, That there be no further exemption insisted upon for any part of the United Kingdom, but that the consideration of any exemptions beyond what is already agreed on in this treaty, shall be left to the determination of the Parliament of Great-Britain.

XV. That whereas by the terms of this treaty, the subjects of Scotland, for preserving an equality of trade throughout the United Kingdom, will be liable to several customs and excises now payable in England, which will be applicable towards payment of the debts of England, contracted before the Union; it is agreed, That Scotland shall have an equivalent for what the subjects thereof shall be so charged towards payment of the said debts of England in all particulars whatsoever, in manner following, vis. That, before the Union of the said Kingdoms, the sum of three hundred ninety-eight thousand and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, be granted to her Majesty by the Parliament of England for the uses after-mentioned, being the equivalent to be answered to Scotland for such parts of the said customs and excises upon all excisable liquors, with which that Kingdom is to be charged upon the Union, as will be applicable to the payment of the said debts of England, according to the proportions which the present customs of Scotland, being thirty thousand pounds per annum, do bear to the customs in England, computed at one million, three hundred and forty-one thousand, five hundred and fifty-nine pounds per annum. And which the present excises on excisable liquors in Scotland, being thirty-three thousand and five hundred pounds per annum, do bear to the excises on excisable liquors in England, computed at nine hundred and forty-seven thousand, six hundred and two pounds per annum; which sum of three hundred and ninety-eight thousand eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, shall be due and payable from the time of the Union. And in regard, that, after the Union, Scotland becoming liable to the same customs and duties payable on import and export, and to the same excises on all excisable liquors as in England, as well upon that account, as upon the account of the increase of trade and people (which will be the happy consequence of the Union) the said revenues will much improve beyond the before-mentioned annual values thereof, of which no present estimate can be made; yet nevertheless, for the reasons aforesaid, there ought to be a proportionable equivalent answered to Scotland; it is agreed, That, after the Union, there shall be an account kept of the said duties arising in Scotland, to the end it may appear what ought to be answered to Scotland as an equivalent for such proportion of the said increase, as shall be applicable to the payment of the debts of England. And, for the further and more effectual answering the several ends hereafter mentioned, it is agreed, That, from and after the Union, the whole increase of the revenues of customs and duties on import and export, and excises upon excisable liquors in Scotland, over and above the annual produce of the said respective duties as above stated, shall go and be applied for the term of seven years to the uses hereafter mentioned, and that upon the said account there shall be answered to Scotland annually, from the end of seven years after the Union, an equivalent in proportion to such part of the said increase, as shall be applicable to the debts of England; and generally, that an equivalent shall be answered to Scotland for such parts of the English debts as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reason of the Union, other than such, for which appropriations have been made by Parliament in England, of the customs or other duties on export and import, excises on all excisable liquors: In respect of which debts, equivalents are herein before provided. And as for the uses, to which the said sum of three hundred and ninety-eight thousand and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, to be granted as aforesaid, and all other monies, which are 1706. most endeavours to retard the march of their respective Masters forces (which were in the pay of England and Holland) to the general rendezvous; upon the confidence of which, the French King sent such positive orders to Marshal Villeroi to fight the Allies, that the Elector of Bavaria, who was then at Brussels, had just time enough to take post-horses, to join the army, which passed the Deule the 19th of May, and posted themselves at Tivlemont, with the Ghœt before them. This army, under the command of the Elector of Bavaria and Marshal Villeroi, consisted of seventy thousand men, and would have been superior to the Confederate army without the Danes. 1706.

The Confederates, on their side, were no less eager for an engagement, but could hardly flatter themselves with the hopes of having to early and so fair an opportunity for it. The Duke of Marlborough being apprehensive, that the French would take the same method over again, and keep behind the Deule, as they had done the year before, had several times expressed his concern about it to thole, who were intimate with to be answered or allowed to Scotland as said is, are to be applied, it is agreed, That, in the first place, out of the aforesaid sum, what consideration shall be found necessary to be had for any losses, which private persons may sustain, by reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of the coin of England, may be made good. In the next place, that the capital stock, or fund of the African and Indian Company of Scotland, advanced together with the interest for the said capital stock after the rate of five per cent. per annum, from the respective times of the payment thereof, shall be paid: Upon payment of which capital stock and interest, it is agreed, The said Company be dissolved and cease; and also, that from the time of passing the act of Parliament in England for raising the said sum of three hundred and ninety-eight thousand and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, the said Company shall neither trade, nor grant licence to trade, providing, That if the said stock and interest shall not be paid in twelve months after the commencement of the Union, that then the said Company may from thence forward trade, or give licence to trade, until the said whole capital stock and interest shall be paid. And as to the overplus of the said sum of three hundred and ninety-eight thousand and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, after payment of what consideration shall be had for losses in repairing the coin, and paying the said capital stock and interest; and also the whole increase of the said revenues of customs, duties, and excises, above the present value, which shall arise in Scotland during the said term of seven years, together with the equivalent, which shall become due upon the improvement thereof in Scotland, after the said term: And also as to all other sums, which, according to the agreements aforesaid, may become payable to Scotland, by way of equivalent for what that Kingdom shall hereafter become liable, towards payment of the debt of England, it is agreed, That the same be applied in manner following, viz. That all the public debts of the Kingdom of Scotland, as shall be adjusted by this present Parliament, shall be paid: And that two thousand pounds per annum, for the space of seven years, shall be applied towards encouraging and promoting the manufacture of coarse wool within those shires, which produce the wool; and that the first two thousand pounds Sterling be paid at Martinmas next, and so yearly at Martinmas during the space aforesaid. And afterwards the same shall be wholly applied towards the encouraging and promoting the fisheries, and such other manufactures and improvements in Scotland, as may most conduce to the general good of the United Kingdom. And it is agreed, That her Majesty may be empowered to appoint Commissioners, who shall be accountable to the Parliament of Great-Britain, for disposing the said sum of three hundred and ninety-eight thousand and eighty-five pounds, ten shillings, and all other monies, which shall arise to Scotland upon the agreements aforesaid, to the purpose before-mentioned: Which Commissioners shall be empowered to call for, receive, and dispose of the said monies in manner aforesaid; and to inspect the books of the several Collectors of the said revenues, and of all other duties from whence an equivalent may arise, and that the Collectors and Managers of the said revenues and duties be obliged to give to the said Commissioners subscribed authentic abbreviates of the produce of such revenues and duties arising in their respective districts: And that the said Commissioners shall have their office within the limits of Scotland, and shall in such office keep books, containing accounts of the amount of the equivalent, and how the same shall have been disposed of from time to time, which may be inspected by any of the subjects, who shall desire the same.

XVI. That, from and after the Union, the coin shall be of the same standard and value throughout the United Kingdom, as now in England, and a Mint shall be continued in Scotland under the same rules as the Mint in England, and the present Officers of the Mint continued, subject to such regulations and alterations, as her Majesty, her Heirs or Successors, or the Parliament of Great-Britain shall think fit.

XVII. That, from and after the Union, the same weights and measures shall be used throughout the United Kingdom, as are now established in England; and standards, weights and measures shall be kept by those Burghs in Scotland, to whom the keeping the standards of weights and measures, now in use there, does of special right belong. All which standards shall be sent down to such respective Burghs from the standards kept in the Exchequer at Westminster, subject nevertheless to such regulations, as the Parliament of Great-Britain shall think fit.

XVIII. That the laws concerning regulation of trade, customs, and such excises to which Scotland is, by virtue of this treaty, to be liable, be the same in Scotland, from and after the Union, as in England; and that all other laws in use within the Kingdom of Scotland, do, after the Union, and notwithstanding thereof, remain in the same force as before (except such as are contrary to, or inconsistent with this treaty) but alterable by the Parliament of Great-Britain: With this difference betwixt the laws concerning public Right, Policy, and Civil Government, and those which concern private Right, That the laws, which concern public Right, Policy, and Civil Government, may be made the same throughout the whole United Kingdom; but that no alteration be made in laws which concern private Right, except for evident utility of the subjects within Scotland.

XIX. That the Court of Session, or College of Justice, do, after the Union, and notwithstanding thereof, remain in all time coming within Scotland, as it is now constituted by the laws of that Kingdom, and with the same authority and privileges as before the Union, subject nevertheless to such regulations, for the better administration of justice, as shall be made by the Parliament of Great-Britain; and that hereafter none shall be named by her Majesty, or her Royal Successors, to be ordinary Lords of Session, but such who have served in the College of Justice as Advocates, or principal Clerks of Session for the space of five years; or, as Writers to the Signet, for the space of ten years; with this provision, That no Writer to the Signet be capable to be admitted a Lord of the Session, unless he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law, before the faculty of Advocates, and be found by them qualified for the said office, two years before he be named to be a Lord of Session: Yet so, as the qualification made, or to be made, for capacitating persons to be named ordinary Lords of Session, may be altered by the Parliament of Great-Britain. And that the Court of Judiciary do also, after the Union, and notwithstanding 1706. with him; and was already taking measures how to prevent it, when an unexpected occasion was thrown into his hands, of signalizing again his courage and conduct.

Upon the enemy's passing the Doule, the Duke sent orders to the Danish horse, who were coming from their garrisons, to hasten their march; and, that there might not be the least pretence of delay, he engaged his promise with the Field-deputies of the States, that their arrears should be paid them. The Duke of Wirttemberg, who commanded those troops, and was well affected to the common cause, seeing every thing was complied with, that the King of Denmark insisted on, thought he needed not to stay, till he sent to that Court, nor wait for express orders; and therefore commanded his troops to march; and they made such expedition, that, on the 22d of May, N. S. being the day before the battle, they came up within a league of the rear of the Confederate army.

About the same time, the French having been joined by the Horse of Marshall de Marfin's army, and confiding in their superiority of numbers, withstanding thereof, remain in all time coming within Scotland, as it is now constituted by the laws of that Kingdom, and with the same authority and privileges as before the Union, subject nevertheless to such regulations as shall be made by the Parliament of Great-Britain, and without prejudice of other rights of Jurisdiction; and that all Admiralty Jurisdictions be under the Lord High-Admiral, or Commissioners for the Admiralty of Great-Britain for the time being; and that the Court of Admiralty, now established in Scotland, be continued, and that all reviews, reductions, or suspensions of the sentences in maritime cases, competent to the jurisdiction of that Court, remain in the same manner after the Union, as now in Scotland, until the Parliament of Great-Britain shall make such regulations and alterations, as shall be judged expedient for the whole United Kingdom, so as there be always continued in Scotland a Court of Admiralty, such as is in England, for determination of all maritime cases relating to private rights in Scotland, competent to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, subject nevertheless to such regulations and alterations, as shall be thought proper to be made by the Parliament of Great-Britain; and that the heretable rights of Admiralty and Vice-Admiralties in Scotland be reserved to the respective Proprietors as rights of property, subject, nevertheless, as to the manner of exercising such heretable rights, to such regulations and alterations as shall be thought proper to be made by the Parliament of Great-Britain. And that all other Courts now in being within the Kingdom of Scotland do remain, but subject to alterations by the Parliament of Great-Britain; and that all inferior Courts within the said limits do remain subordinate, as they are now, to the supreme Courts of Justice within the same in all time coming; and that no causes in Scotland be cognoscible by the Courts of Chancery, Queen's-Bench, Common-Pleas, or any other Court in Westminster-Hall; and that the said Courts, or any other of the like nature, after the Union, shall have no power to cognosce, review, or alter the acts or sentences of the Judicature within Scotland, or stop the execution of the same: And that there be a Court of Exchequer in Scotland after the Union, for deciding questions concerning the revenues of customs and excises there, having the same power and authority in such cases, as the Court of Exchequer has in England; and that the said Court of Exchequer in Scotland have power of passing Signatures, Gifts, Tutories, and in other things, as the Court of Exchequer at present in Scotland hath; and that the Court of Exchequer, that now is in Scotland, do remain until a new Court of Exchequer be settled by the Parliament of Great-Britain in Scotland after the Union: And that, after the Union, the Queen's Majesty, and her Royal Successors, may continue a Privy-Council in Scotland, for preserving the public peace and order, until the Parliament of Great-Britain shall think fit to alter it, or establish any other effectual method for that end.

XX. That all heretable offices, superiorities, heretable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life, be reserved to the owners thereof, as rights of property, in the same manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, notwithstanding this treaty.

XXI. That the Rights and Privileges of the Royal Boroughs in Scotland, as they now are, do remain in force after the Union, and notwithstanding thereof.

XXII. That, by virtue of this treaty, of the Peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, sixteen shall be the number to sit and vote in the house of Lords, and forty-five the number of the Representatives of Scotland, in the House of Commons, of the Parliament of Great-Britain; and that when her Majesty, her Heirs or Successors, shall declare her or their Pleasure, for holding the first or any subsequent Parliament of Great-Britain, until the Parliament of Great-Britain shall make further provision therein, a writ do issue under the Great-Seal of the United Kingdom, directed to the Privy-Council of Scotland, commanding them to cause sixteen Peers, who are to sit in the House of Lords, to be summoned to Parliament; and forty-five Members to be elected to sit in the House of Commons of the Parliament of Great-Britain, according to the agreement in this treaty, in such manner as by an act of this present Session of the Parliament of Scotland is, or shall be settled; which act is hereby declared to be as valid as if it were a part of, and ingrossed in this treaty. And that the names of the persons so summoned and elected, shall be returned by the Privy-Council of Scotland, into the Court from whence the said writ did issue. And that if her Majesty, on or before the first day of May next, on which day the Union is to take place, shall declare under the Great-Seal of England, that it is expedient that the Lords of Parliament of England, and Commons of the present Parliament of England, should be the Members of the respective Houses of the first Parliament of Great-Britain, for and on the part of England, then the said Lords of Parliament of England, and Commons of the present Parliament of England shall be the Members of the respective Houses of the first Parliament of Great-Britain, for and on the part of England. And her Majesty may, by her Royal proclamation, under the Great-Seal of Great-Britain, appoint the said first Parliament of Great-Britain, to meet at such time and place as her Majesty shall think fit, which time shall not be less than fifty days after the date of such proclamation: And, the time and place of the meeting of such Parliament being so appointed, a writ shall be immediately issued under the Great-Seal of Great-Britain, directed to the Privy-Council of Scotland, for the summoning the sixteen Peers, and for electing forty-five Members, by whom Scotland is to be represented in the Parliament of Great-Britain: And the Lords of Parliament of England, and the sixteen Peers of Scotland, such sixteen Peers being summoned and returned in the manner agreed in this treaty; and the Members of the House of Commons of the said Parliament of England, and the forty-five Members for Scotland, such forty-five Members being elected and returned in the manner agreed in this treaty, shall assemble and meet respectively in their respective Houses of the Parliament of Great-Britain, at such time and place as shall be so appointed by her Majesty, and shall be the two Houses of the first Parliament of Great-Britain; and that Parliament may continue for such time only, as the present Parliament of England might have continued, if the Union of the two Kingdoms had not been made, unless sooner dissolved by her Majesty. And that every one of the Lords of Parliament of Great-Britain, and every Member of the House of Commons of the Parliament of Great-Britain, in the first, and all succeeding Parliaments of Great-Britain, until the Parliament of Great-Britain shall otherwise direct, shall take the respective oaths appointed to be taken, instead of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, by an Act of Parliament made in England, in the

The battle of Ramillies.

The next day, being Whitsunday, about four o'clock in the morning, the Confederate army marched in eight columns towards Ramillies, a village, near which the Gheet takes its source, that they might avoid the inconvenience of passing that river (1). They soon had information, that the enemy's army, having decamped from Tirlemont, was likewise on their march to meet them, their baggage and heavy cannon being left at Judoigne. The Elector of Bavaria and Marshall de Villeroy, not in the least suspecting, that the Danes had joined the Confederate army, were fully determined upon engaging them, either that day or the next, being apprehensive, that the Duke of Mariborough had formed a design of investing Namur. The enemy's army then consisted of seventy-six battalions of foot, and a hundred and thirty-two squadrons of horse, having sixty-two cannon, eleven mortars, and thirty-six pontoons. Their immediate design was to possess themselves of Ramillies, and the strong camp thereabouts, to prevent the Confederates doing the same; and in this they so far succeeded, that, being nearer, they got there first. Their fears were however groundless concerning Namur; for the Duke of Mariborough had no such design. His resolution was the same with theirs; and, had not they offered him battle that day, he would certainly have attacked them the next. The two armies met near first year of the Reign of the late King William and Queen Mary, intituled, An act for the abrogating of the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and appointing other oaths; and make, subscribe, and audibly repeat the declaration mentioned in an act of Parliament made in England, in the thirtieth year of the Reign of King Charles II. intituled, An act for the more effectual preserving the King's Person and Government, by disabling Papists from sitting in either House of Parliament; and shall take and subscribe the oath mentioned in an act of Parliament made in England, in the first year of her Majesty's Reign, intituled, An act to declare the alterations in the oath appointed to be taken by the act, intituled, An act for the further security of her Majesty's Person, and the succession of the Crown in the Protestant line, and for extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other Pretenders, and their open and secret abettors; and for the declaring the association to be determined at such time, and in such manner, as the Members of both Houses of Parliament of England are, by the said respective acts, directed to take, make, and subscribe the same, upon the penalties and disabilities in the said respective acts contained. And it is declared and agreed, that these words, This Realm, The Crown of this Realm, and The Queen of this Realm, mentioned in the oaths and declaration contained in the aforesaid acts, which were intended to signify the Crown and Realm of England, shall be understood of the Crown and Realm of Great-Britain; and that, in that sense, the said oaths and declaration be taken and subscribed by the Members of both Houses of the Parliament of Great-Britain.

XXIII. That the aforesaid sixteen Peers of Scotland, mentioned in the last preceding article, to sit in the House of Lords of the Parliament of Great-Britain, shall have all privileges of Parliament, which the Peers of England now have, and which they, or any Peers of Great-Britain, shall have after the Union, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trials of Peers: And in case of the trial of any Peer, in time of adjournment, or prorogation of Parliament, the said sixteen Peers shall be summoned in the same manner, and have the same powers and privileges at such trial, as any other Peers of Great-Britain; and that, in case any trials of Peers shall hereafter happen, when there is no Parliament in being, the sixteen Peers of Scotland who sat in the last preceding Parliament, shall be summoned in the same manner, and have the same powers and privileges at such trials, as any other Peers of Great-Britain: And that all Peers of Scotland, and their Successors to their honours and dignities, shall, from and after the Union, be Peers of Great-Britain, and have rank and precedence next and immediately after the Peers of the like orders and degrees in England at the time of the Union; and before all Peers of Great Britain, of the like orders and degrees, who may be created after the Union, and shall be tried as Peers of Great Britain, and shall enjoy all privileges of Peers, as fully as the Peers of England do now, or as they, or any other Peers of Great-Britain, may hereafter enjoy the same, except the right and privilege of sitting in the House of Lords, and the privileges depending thereon, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trials of Peers.

XXIV. That, from and after the Union, there be one Great-Seal for the United Kingdom of Great-Britain, which shall be different from the Great-Seal now used in either Kingdom; and that the quartering the arms, and the rank and precedence of the Lion King of Arms of the Kingdom of Scotland, as may best suit the Union, be left to her Majesty: And that, in the mean time, the Great-Seal of England be used as the Great-Seal of the United Kingdom; and that the Great-Seal of the United Kingdom be used for sealing writs to elect and summon the Parliament of Great-Britain, and for sealing all treaties with foreign Princes and States, and all public acts, instruments, and orders of State, which concern the whole United Kingdom, and in all other matters relating to England, as the Great-Seal of England is now used; and that a Seal in Scotland, after the Union, be always kept and made use of in all things relating to private rights or grants, which have usually passed the Great-Seal of Scotland, and which only concern offices, grants, commissions, and private rights within that Kingdom; and that, until such Seal be appointed by her Majesty, the present Great-Seal of Scotland shall be used for such purposes; and that the Privy-Seal, Signet, Casket, Signet of the Judiciary-Court, Quarter-Seal, and Seals of Courts now used in Scotland be continued: But that the said Seals be altered and adapted to the State of the Union, as her Majesty shall think fit; and the said Seals, and all of them, and the Keepers of them, shall be subject to such regulations, as the Parliament of Great-Britain shall hereafter make. And that the Crown, Scepter, and Sword of State, the Records of Parliament, and all other Records, Rolls, and Registers whatsoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are within that part of the United Kingdom now called Scotland; and that they shall so remain in all time coming, notwithstanding of the Union.

XXV. That all laws and statutes in either Kingdom, so far as they are contrary to, or inconsistent with, the terms of these articles, or any of them, shall, from and after the Union, cease and become void, and shall be so declared to be by the respective Parliaments of the said Kingdoms.

(1) Ramillies is a village (surrounded with a ditch) in Brabant, in the district of Leuven, by the skirts of the Province of Namur, rendered famous to all posterity by the glorious victory obtained there by the Duke of Mariborough and Monseigneur D'Auverquerque, over the Elector of Bavaria and Marshall Villeroy, which was followed by the reduction of almost all the Netherlands in two months time. It lies at the head of the Gheet, about a mile and half North from the side of the Mehaigne, that interval being the narrow aperture where that glorious battle was fought. It is six miles almost South from Judoigne, twelve miles South from Tirlemont, fourteen miles West-North-West from Huy, and eleven miles North from Namur.

(1) The

1706. near the village of Ramillies, from whence the battle took its name. When the Confederate army was advanced near this place, they found the enemy getting into the camp of Mount St. Andre, and placing their right on the Mebaigne, where they had posted a Brigade of foot, and filled the space between that and Ramillies, which is about half a league, an open and level ground, with near a hundred squadrons, among which were the troops of the King's household. They had likewise above twenty battalions of foot, with a battery of about twelve pieces of cannon, at Ramillies.

About one in the morning, the Duke of Marlborough sent the Quarter-Master General with the camp colours, and a few squadrons towards Ramillies, to make a feint, as if they designed to form a camp there, the better to penetrate into the enemy's designs; and, about three, the Duke and Monsieur Auverquerque decamped with the whole army, and advanced in eight columns in a great fog. A little after eight, the advanced guard of the Confederates, which consisted of six hundred horse, and had been sent with all the Quarter-Masters of the army, to view the ground, arrived at the height of Merdorp (or Merdan) from whence they perceived, that the enemy were in motion, and marched in the plain of Mount St. Andre, extending themselves as far as the tomb of Hottomont, towards the Mebaigne. Hereupon they halted, and sent intelligence to the Duke of Marlborough and Monsieur Auverquerque, who being advanced about ten to view the enemy, they could not at first judge, whether those squadrons they saw were only to cover their march into their lines, or whether they were the van of the enemy, that came to offer battle. The Duke therefore gave orders to the horse to hasten their march, resolving, if those he saw had been only covering squadrons, to attack them with his cavalry only. But, the fog being soon after dispersed, and the army being then in full view of the enemy, the Duke found their whole army approach, with an apparent resolution to fight, upon which he made all the necessary dispositions to receive them. The enemy, seeing the Confederates so near them, possessed themselves of a very strong camp; placing their right near the tomb of Hottomont, against the Mebaigne, and their left at Anderkirk, and posted a good number of their Infantry in their villages of Anderkirk, Offuz, and Ramillies, which last was near their center; besides which, they put five battalions near the hedges of the village of Franquemies, which was on their right. The Confederate army was at the same time drawn up in order of battle, the right wing being posted near Foltz, on the rivulet Yause, with a little morass in front; and the left near the village of Franquemies on the Mebaigne; where, besides the number of the horse belonging to that wing, the Duke of Marlborough ordered the Danish squadrons, being twenty-one in number, to be posted; rightly judging, by the situation of the ground, that the stress of the action would be on that side. All things being thus disposed, it was resolved to attack the village of Ramillies, which was the enemy's principal post, and, from thence to Anderkirk, had formed a line of foot along the Gheet, and a line of horse behind them. In order to this attempt, twenty pieces of cannon of twenty-four pounders, and some howitzers, were brought up; and twelve battalions, which were to be supported by the whole line, were ordered to make the first onset, under the command of Lieutenant-General Schultz.

About half an hour past one, the artillery of the Confederates began to play. It was immediately answered by the enemy's cannon; and both continued firing with considerable execution. Whilst the Duke of Marlborough was at the head of the lines, to give the necessary orders every where, Velt-Marshall Auverquerque repaired to the left, where perceiving, that the enemy's foot posted in the hedges of Franquemies, galled the horse of that wing, he commanded four battalions, with two pieces of cannon under Colonel Wertmuller, to dislodge them from thence, which they performed with great vigour and resolution. Hereupon the enemy detached two battalions and fourteen squadrons of dragoons, on foot, to regain that important post; but Auverquerque commanded, at the same time, the whole wing of the Dutch horse, to attack the enemy; which not only prevented their design, but put those dragoons into such disorder, that they were not able, either to reach the village, or recover their horses, which they had left a good way behind the tomb of Hottomont, and so were most of them cut in pieces, and taken prisoners. The Dutch cavalry charged with a good deal of bravery, sword in hand, and soon after the engagement were sustained by the Danish squadrons; but having to deal with the French King's Household, the Musquetaires, Gens d'Armes, Garde de Corps, Horse Grenadiers, and other choice troops which were in the enemy's right, the conflict was obstinate, and the success doubtful for above an hour. The Danish horse, which fought on the left of all, behaved themselves with such gallantry, that they forced the enemy to give ground, and broke several of their squadrons; but, at the same time, the French had almost an equal advantage against the Dutch horse of the right of the left wing, whom they put into great confusion. To remedy this, the Duke of Marlborough, who was advanced that way, sent for twenty squadrons of horse from the right wing, where they could not engage the enemy's left, by reason of a morass, which separated them; and with these he reinforced his left, adding to them his body of reserve (1).

The

(1) The French Writers, who have given a description of this battle, allow of this as a very prudent part of the Duke of Marlborough's conduct; but, to cover the disgrace of their favourite troops, pretend, that the Duke sent fifty, and not twenty squadrons from his right, and made four lines of them, besides a column composed of the body of reserve. "Thus," says Father Daniel, the whole weight of the battle fell upon the right wing of the French army, where

"the troops of his Majesty's household were placed. "The body, which had hitherto been invincible, entered the enemy's troops, and overthrew the three first lines, but, finding a fourth, and the column above-mentioned, which was moving to fall upon them in flank, they were obliged to give way, and retire to rally behind the troops, which followed them, and who, instead of sustaining them, retreated without coming to the battle. Matters being

The Duke, while these troops were advancing from the right, rallied some of the broken squadrons, and gave his orders for others to charge. In this place he was in the extremity of danger; for, being singled out by several of the most resolute of the enemy, and having the misfortune, as he was leaping a ditch, to fall from his horse (1), he had been either killed or taken prisoner, if some of the Confederate foot, that were near at hand, had not come very seasonably to his assistance. After this, he had still a narrower escape, a cannon-ball taking off the head of Colonel Brienfeld, his Gentleman of the horse, as he was holding the stirrup for the Duke to remount.

The twenty squadrons, which the Duke had sent for from the right to reinforce the left, had but little share in the defeat of the enemy's right; for, by that time they were come up, the Dutch and Danes, having charged them both in front and flank, had almost compleated that signal piece of service, cutting in pieces the best part of the French King's Household troops, so that they could never be fully re-established during the remainder of the war. In the mean time, the village of Ramillies was vigorously attacked by General Schultz, with the twelve battalions under him. The enemy, having the advantage of the ground, defended themselves with great resolution and obstinacy, till, seeing the whole line of the Confederate infantry in motion to support General Schultz, and the Dutch and Danish horse advancing to surround them, they thought of making their retreat; but found it was too late; for they were intercepted by the victorious horse, and most of them either killed or taken prisoners.

The rest of the enemy's infantry endeavoured likewise to make their escape, which they did in better order, being favoured by the horse of their left wing, who, being covered by a rivulet and morais, had not yet been attacked, and formed themselves in three lines between Offuz and Anderkirk. But the English horse, having found means to pass the rivulet, charged the enemy with such unparalleled briskness and courage, that they intirely abandoned their foot; and our dragoons, pushing into the village of Anderkirk, made a terrible slaughter of them. The rest of the enemy, who were at the same time attacked by the English and Dutch foot with equal bravery, gave way on all sides. Their horse rallied again in the plains, to cover the disorderly retreat of their foot; but they were so closely pursued by the Confederate cavalry, that they were forced to divide themselves into three small bodies, that they might fly the better three different ways. Those, that took to the left, were pursued by the Dutch and Danes, who made great slaughter amongst them, and took abundance of prisoners; and those, that fled to the right, were chased by the regiments of Lumley, Hay, and Refs; which two last fell in with the foot Regiment du Roy, of whom having killed many, the rest threw down their arms, and begged quarter, which was immediately granted. Upon this, they delivered their arms and colours to the Lord John Hay's dragoons; but, when these dragoons faced about, in order to pursue the enemy, they treacherously attempted to take up their arms again; in which, however, they were prevented, and suffered severely for their perfidy.

The foremost regiments of the English horse, that pursued the enemy's center, were that of Lieutenant-General Wood, commanded by himself, and Wynabam's (afterwards Palmer's) carabineers, headed by Major Perry. When they came upon a rising ground, they saw seven squadrons of the Spanish and Bavarian Guards, among whom was the Elector himself, and Villeroi, who hoped, with these few choice troops, to make good their retreat, and save their cannon, which was marching in a line before them. General Wood galloped with his own regiment upon the enemy's left, and charged them so vigorously, that he broke them entirely, killing many of them, and taking not a few prisoners, among whom were two Lieutenant-Colonels, one Major, four Captains, and several subaltern Officers. He also took the standard of the Elector's Guards, two of his own Troopers, and killed his Kettle-drummer; the Elector himself and Villeroi very narrowly escaping. Major Perry, at the head of Wynabam's Carabineers, fell upon the enemy with equal briskness and resolution; put many of them to the sword, and took several prisoners, particularly the Major of the Spanish Guards, Monsieur de la Guertiere, and Monsieur de Bruan, Corner of the same, besides four Officers, and forty-six private men of the Royal Bombardiers, with their colours. The English horse and dragoons followed the chase through and by Judoigne, till two o'clock in the morning, as far as Meldert, being five leagues from the place, where the action happened, and two from Lawain. During this retreat, a misfortune happened to the enemy, which contributed not a little to compleat the victory. Several waggons of their Van-guard breaking down stopped the way, so that their baggage and artillery, which followed, could not pass, nor could their troops desile in good order. Perceiving, that the Confederate horse, having got intelligence of this accident, pursued them close, they threw down their arms, that they might escape with the more ease, and retreated in the greatest confusion. Here it was, that the most prisoners were taken; for, in the action, little or no quarter was given, the Confederate horse having been highly provoked by the idle Gasconades of the French Musquetaires and Gens d'Armes, of which they were very full when they came to the attack, but paid dearly for it in

" in this ill situation, the left wing of the French, which had not been able to engage by reason of the morais, which lay between them and the enemy, drew up in order upon a rising ground, as was well judged by the Marquis de Mefiers Lieutenant-General, and stopped the progress of the enemy's horse, which pressed the household troops very closely, and, by this means, gave them an opportunity " to rally, and make their retreat in good order. The most part of the troops disbanded themselves before the retreat; and this caused the disorders, which followed; for we had not above three or four thousand men slain in the battle."

(1) Some officers, who were in the engagement, said, the Duke was borne down by some of the disordered Dutch horse. Possibly both may be true.

1706. in the sequel. In short, never was victory more compleat; the Confederates made themselves masters of all the enemy's cannon, except two or three, to the number of about fifty pieces; most of their baggage; about a hundred and twenty colours, or standards, and several pair of kettle-drums. The enemy's loss of men, according to the most general computation, amounted to eight thousand slain, and among them, Prince Maximilian and Prince Monbafon; and about fix thousand private soldiers, and near six hundred Officers taken prisoners; which, with their deserters and wounded, made their loss not less than twenty thousand men (1). Some accounts make the number of deserters so great, that scarce half of their army must have ever returned to their colours. The persons of note among the prisoners were Messieurs Palavicini and Miziere, Major-Generals; the Marquis de Bar, Brigadier-General of horse; the Marquis de Nonant, Brigadier-General of foot; the Marquis de la Baume, son of the Marshal de Tallard; Monsieur de Montmorency, nephew to the late Duke of Luxemburg; a nephew of Lord Clare, and several others (2).

The Elector of Bavaria and Marshal de Villeroi, with the greatest part of the broken remains of their army, continued their precipitate flight till they reached Louvain; where having held (by torch-light, in the Market-place) a Council of war, they resolved to abandon that place, and retire towards Brussels. On the other hand,

(1) The Duke of Marlborough said to Bishop Burnet, the French army looked the best of any he had ever seen: But that their Officers did not do their part, nor shew the courage that had appeared among them on other occasions. And, when the Bishop asked him the difference between the actions at Hochstedt and at Ramillies, he said, The battle of Hochstedt lasted between seven and eight hours, and we lost above twelve thousand men; whereas the battle of Ramillies lasted not above two hours, and we lost not above two thousand five hundred men. Vol. II. 451.

(2) The Marquis de Feuquieres represents this battle as fatal to the two Crowns, and observes, that this decisive action was resolved upon without any of those inducements, by which a General ought to be conducted, when he determines to engage an enemy. He lays it down as a maxim with relation to battles, that a General should never be disposed, either to offer or receive battle, except in those conjunctures, wherein the benefits, that will redound to his Prince from a prosperous event, will be much greater than any disadvantage he can possibly sustain by a defeat. "This first maxim, so incontestable in its own nature, and so necessary to be observed, was intirely disregarded on this occasion by Marshal de Villeroi. Notwithstanding the fatal event of the battle of Hochstedt, the war, that rekindled on the Rhine, was sustained with equality. It was carried on to advantage in Italy, where the Duke of Vendome, who opposed Prince Eugene, gave Monsieur de Feuillade an opportunity to form the siege of Turin. The Duke of Berwick sustained a very difficult war with Spain, after Marshal de Theffé had quitted the siege of Barcelona in so pusillanimous a manner. The Confederate Crowns therefore should have only maintained a defensive war in Flanders during this campaign, and for which we were effectually prepared by forming a new line along the Deule. Our resolution therefore to open the campaign with a general action, the success of which would have been but inconsiderable on our part, in that early season, was a remarkable error in that general state of affairs; and resulted from a presumptive vanity, and a perfect inattention to the general plan of the war. Marshal de Villeroi was determined, without the least reason, to open the campaign out of his lines. With this view he marched to Tirlemont; but he should have thought this motion sufficient, and he might possibly have had just inducements to make it. An army, which is only charged with a defensive war in its lines, ought to be assembled sooner than the enemy, in order to gain some days, at least, for the consumption of the forage near the lines; and, had we pursued this cautious conduct, it would have been difficult for the enemy to approach our lines; and their continuance in the adjacent country would have been destructive to their cavalry and equipage. If Marshal de Villeroi had been content with his advance to Tirlemont, and had caused his army to consume the forage between his camp and the Deule, he might have effected the preservation of the Netherlands, and the security of his lines, without hazarding any engagement. But he thought this first march insufficient, though it might have produced a very judicious effect; and instead of waiting for the Elector of Bavaria, with whom, in mere deference to his rank, he ought, at least, to have acted in concert, he decamped from Tirlemont, and advanced to Ramillies, without acquiring any intelligence of the motions formed by the enemy, who were then assembled near Tongres. When the van of his march began to appear at the head of the Little Gheet, where Ramillies is seated, he was informed, that the enemy were advancing to him, and that their front already began to be discovered. He then prepared to form his troops in order of battle, with a full persuasion, that the enemy would not presume to attack so formidable an army as his. Had his disposition been regular, the bravery of his troops might have rendered the action successful; but it was so extremely injudicious and ill-precautioned against the order, in which he saw the enemy ranged, that it can be hardly thought surprising, that the event of this battle was so fatal, as it really proved. I shall now represent the errors committed by Marshal de Villeroi with respect to his particular disposition, which I shall describe from the left of the army, and through the extent of the line to the extremity of the right. I shall then proceed to the second line; and from thence to the rear, to make it evident, that the disposition was every where irregular, and contrary to all just rules. The left wing of the cavalry was covered by the Gheet, and the marshes that bounded it; and where the troops could neither charge the enemy, nor be charged by them; and consequently they continued useless during the engagement. The village of Ramillies, which was seated in a plain beyond the source of the Gheet, fronted the right of the infantry, and Marshal de Villeroi had posted some battalions there; but the village was too distant from our line, to be supported to any effect, when it should happen to be attacked by the enemy. We even neglected to open the hedges towards the line, in order to advance with a more extended front, in case it should be necessary to support the infantry in the village, who had not the precaution to accommodate that place, either to their front or flanks, nor even to form a communication between their several battalions, so that they were only posted in the inclosures and gardens. But the most extraordinary circumstance of all was, that, in order to defend the village, which, it was imagined, would cost the enemy very dear to surprize, though it was too remote from the line, to produce any such effect, we posted there all the useless infantry of the army, composed, for the greatest part, of foreign battalions and recruits, and even prisoners taken from the enemy. When the village therefore was attacked, the assailants only engaged a set of considerable troops, who were ill-disposed, and not supported either in time, or from any situation near camp, and abandoned Louvain. Whereupon 1706. bridges being laid over that river, a detachment of five hundred men was sent to take possession of the place, and the whole army passed the river the next day, about noon, and incamped at Betblem (1).

No. 48. Vol. III.

“ enough to have any effect; and the village was “ forced by an attack upon the flanks, which were “ intirely unprotected. The disposition of our right
“ was still worse than that of our left of the center.
“ The village of Taniers on the bank of the Mebaigne “ ought to have supported our right, and reserved a “ considerable body of infantry to guard it; but Mar“ shal de Villeroy contented himself at first with de“ taching a regiment of dragoons thither, who were “ very severely treated by the enemy's infantry; and “ he afterwards supplied it with a brigade and four “ battalions, who were overwhelmed by the superior “ fire of the enemy's infantry, who were already mas“ ters of the village. I shall add to all this inconfide“ rate disposition of the front a particular neglect,
“ which contributed likewise to the loss of the battle.
“ I have already observed, that Marshal de Villeroy “ received intelligence in the morning, that the en“emy were advancing towards him; and, yet in all the “ course of time he then had to disengage his troops “ from the impediments of their baggage, he never “ thought of that precaution; so that the greatest “ part of it was heaped up between the two lines, “ and embarrassed their motions, especially to the “ right, where the action was sustained. Such were “ the principal defects in our disposition; and they “ were all so very considerable and essential, that one “ alone would have been sufficient to have lost us the “ battle. The enemy, who were sensible of our in“ judicious arrangement, were above five hours in “ changing their order of battle, in order to form “ another, that might be more advantageous to them “ in that conjuncture. In all that length of time our “ troops continued under arms, without forming any “ motion; and whatever instances could possibly be “ made to Marshal de Villeroy to adjust his order of “ battle by that, which he saw the enemy forming,
“ in order to attack us, it was impossible to prevail “ upon him to vary his first disposition. Our whole “ army beheld the enemy unguarding their right, be“ cause it would have been in vain for them to have “ attacked our left, which was covered by the Gheet.
“ The Lieutenant-General, who commanded on the “ left, sent frequent intelligence to Marshal de Villeroy
“ of the enemy's motions, which he had observed,
“ and proposed to him, not to leave any more caval“ry on the left, than would be proportionable to “ what the enemy reserved at their right, and to dou“ ble the rest behind the left. But Monsieur de Gaf“ son recommended this salutary and judicious advice
“ in vain. It was likewise observed, that the enemy “ still drew off part of their infantry from their right,
“ and formed several lines before the village of Ra-“ millies, and the right of our infantry; and we “ might naturally imagine they intended to make a “ powerful effort against that village, and the right of “ our infantry. But whatever remonstrances could “ be made to Marshal de Villeroy, to induce him to “ approach the village, and double part of the infan“ try of the left behind that of the right and center, “ as he saw performed by the enemy, he continued “ inflexible, though he had all imaginable reason to “ conform the disposition for his defence to the en“emy's preparations for attacking him. It was like“ wise observed, that the enemy drew off a body of “ infantry from their second line, and marched them
“ to Taniers; and it was represented, though ineffec-“ tually, to Marshal de Villeroy, that the enemy pour“ ed all their force to their left, and that it would be “ impossible for our right to sustain so formidable an “ effort; but no consideration could induce him to act “ confidently with the enemy. In fine, when above “ five hours had been employed by the enemy in “ forming the disposition I have described; while “ Marshal de Villeroy, in all that length of time, ne“ ver made the least provision for enabling the right to “ support the shock with which they were threatened,

“ the enemy attacked the village of Taniers; and,
“ when they had intirely carried it, and improved it
“ to support their left, they advanced in four lines to “ our right wing of cavalry, and in several lines and “ columns to our infantry, who were posted in the “ village of Ramillies. As they approached our right, “ they advanced their second and fourth lines into the “ intervals of their first and second lines; so, that “ when they made their advance upon us, they form“ ed only one front, without any intermediate spaces.
“ This motion was performed so near us, that our “ right had no time either to close themselves, in or“ der to fill their intervals by that contraction, or to “ supply them with the second line, which, besides “ their immoderate distance from the first line, were “ incapable of making that advance with freedom, on “ account of the several equipages, which, as I have “ already intimated, were left, through mere negli“ gence, between the two lines. Our right therefore “ was charged by one contiguous front, whose squa“ drons, that forced our intervals, penetrated without “ opposition, and then wheeled about to charge the “ squadrons of our first line in the rear, who, though “ they had almost defeated all the squadrons that at“ tacked them, were now thrown into a general dis“ order by the squadrons of the enemy's second line,
“ and by those, who charged them in the rear. The “ enemy conducted the attack of the village differ-“ ly from that of the cavalry on the right. They “ advanced to it in four columns; but, when they ap“ proached the front of that village, they were con“ vinced, that our line of foot was too remote to “ protect it with their fire, and that the flank of the “ village was not guarded by troops, because their “ number in that place was too inconsiderable. From “ this bad disposition on our part they derived one,
“ that was advantageous to themselves; for they ad“ vanced one of their last lines into the front of the “ first; and, when they were marching up to the vil“ lage, this front extended in an angle to the flank of “ that village, and easily forced it, while the other “ troops sustained the attack from the front of that “ place. All this disorder of our right was not to be “ retrieved, either by the presence of the General “ himself, or the several General Officers in that quar“ ter. The bravery, both of Officers and Soldiers, “ was incapable of reinstating an action, that was lost
“ by a bad disposition; so that a general confusion was “ communicated through all our right, who abandoned
“ the field of battle and their cannon. The left of “ the cavalry, and some battalions of the left, who “ had not shared the engagement, retired without any “ molestation, till the approach of night, when the “ flight and disorder became universal.

“ Thus did the enemy, in the space of one quarter
“ of an hour, defeat an army of eighty thousand men, “ while their own loss did not amount to two thou“ sand. They took eighty pieces of cannon, and a “ prodigious quantity of baggage; and conquered all
“ the Spanish Netherlands, which our General had “ abandoned.”

the next day after the memorable battle of Ramillies, and the Duke of Marlborough took possession of it on the 25th. It stands on the river Deule, eleven miles duced.

After the battle of Ramillies, there was nothing to be seen in the Low-Countries, but a general revolution; and the Allies were attended with a continued course of conquest. The inhabitants of those parts, weary of the French Government, received the Confederate Generals every where as their Deliverers, who had redeemed them from slavery, and recovered their ancient liberty. The cities of Lowain, Mechlin, and Brussels submitted, besides many lesser places. Antwerp made a shew of standing out, but soon followed the example of the rest. Ghent and Bruges did the same. In all these King Charles was proclaimed. Upon this unexpected rapidity of success, the Duke of Marlborough went to the Hague on the 9th of June, to concert measures with the States; where he staid but a few days, for they agreed to every thing he proposed, and sent him back with full powers. The first thing he undertook was the siege of Ostend, a place famous for its long siege in the last age. The natives of the place were disposed to return to the Austrian family; and the French, who were in it, had so lost all heart and spirit, that they made not the resistance, which was expected. In ten days after, the Confederates sat down before it, and, within four days after the batteries were finished, the place capitulated (1.) From thence they proceeded to Menin, which was esteemed the best finished fortification in all those parts. It was built after the peace of Nimwegen; nothing, that art could contrive, was wanting to render it impregnable; and it was defended by a garrison of six thousand men; so that many thought it was too bold an undertaking to sit down before it. The French army was become considerable by great detachments brought from the Upper Rhine, where Marshal Villars was so far superior to the Germans, that, if it had not been for this revulsion of his forces, the Circles of Swabia and Franconia would have been much exposed to pillage and contribution (2.)

Vendosme commands in Flanders.

The Duke of Vendosme's conduct in Italy had so raised his character, that he was thought the only man fit to be at the head of the army in Flanders; and was accordingly sent for, and had that command given him with a high compliment, which was very injurious to the other Officers, since he was declared to be the single man, on whom France could depend, and by whom it could be protected in that extremity. The siege of Menin was carried on so successfully, that the trenches were opened on the 24th of July, and the batteries finished on the 29th; and the place was so warmly pressed, that it capitulated on the 11th of August, and, on the 14th, being St. Louis's day, four thousand men marched out of the town. It seemed strange, that a garrison, which was still so numerous, should surrender in so short a time a place, which was both so strong and so well furnished. But as the French were much sunk, so the Allies were now become very expert at carrying on of sieges, and spared no cost, that was necessary for dispatch. Dendermonde had been for some weeks under a blockade (3). This the Duke of Marlborough ordered to be turned into a formal siege. The place was so surrounded with water, that the French King, having once begun a siege there, was forced to raise it; yet it was now so pressed, that the garrison offered to capitulate; but the Duke would give them no other terms, but those of being prisoners of war, to which they were obliged to submit. Aeth was next invested; it lay so inconveniently between Flanders and Brabant, that it was necessary to clear that communication, and deliver Brussels from the danger of that neighbourhood. In a fortnight's time it was also obliged to capitulate; and the garrison were made prisoners of war (4).

monde and Aeth
taken.

During these sieges, the Duke of Vendosme, having fixed himself in a camp that could not be forced, did not think fit to give the Duke of Marlborough any disturbance, while he lay with his army covering the sieges. The French were jealous of the Elector of Bavaria's heat, and, though he desired to command an army apart, yet it was not thought fit to divide their forces, though now grown to be very numerous. Defflers said, that the panic was still so great in the army, that there was no appearance of their venturing on any action. Paris itself was under no little consternation; and, though the King carried his misfortunes with an appearance of calmness and compulure, yet he was often let blood, which was thought an indication of a great commotion within; and this was, no doubt, the greater, because it was so much disguised. No news was talked of at that Court; all was silent and solemn; so that even the Duchess Dowager of Orleans knew not the true state of their affairs; which made her write to her Aunt, the Electress of Hanover, to learn news of her.

Whilst these things passed in Flanders, the Courts of Spain and France took such early measures to attack King Charles both by sea and land, Europe, Burnet.

(1) Ostend is a very strong and fine sea-port of the Low-Countries, in the Earldom of Flanders, the Marquisate of the territory of Fianden-Urien. It was invested by the Confederates both by sea and land, June 25, 1706, and obliged to surrender, July 6. It stands about nine miles Northeast of Newport, eleven West of Bruges, twenty South-West of Sluys, twenty-four North-East of Dunkirk, and thirty-five almost West of Ghent.

(2) Menin, a town of the Low-Countries, in the Earldom of Flanders, one of the strongest and most regular fortifications in Europe; notwithstanding which (together with the vigorous resistance of a numerous garrison, and a resolute Commander) the Confederates made themselves masters of it in eighteen days after the opening of the trenches. It stands on the river Lys, five miles South-West of Courtray, nine almost North of Lisse, and twelve almost South-East of Ypres.

(3) Dendermonde, a strong town of the Low-Countries, in the Earldom of Flanders. It was blocked up by the Confederates soon after the battle of Ramillies, and surrendered to the Duke of Marlborough after a formal siege the beginning of August. It stands on the river Scheld, and Dender, twelve miles East of Ghent, fourteen South-West of Antwerp, and seventeen North-West of Brussels.

(4) Aeth, a strong frontier-town of the Low-Countries, in the Earldom of Hainault, the Marquisate of the territory of Brabant. The French took it in 1697, but restored it to the Spaniards the same year by the peace of Ryswick: And the Confederates (under the command of Monsieur D' Auverquerque) took possession of it the present campaign. It stands on the river Dender, fourteen miles almost North-West of Mons, twenty-two almost South-West of Brussels, and twenty-four South of Ghent.

1706. land, before he could be relieved by the maritime powers, that his affairs were reduced to the last degree of despair. King Philip set out in February from Madrid, in order to open the campaign with the sieges of Valencia and Gironne. He was advised to begin with the reduction of Valencia; not only as it lay nearer, and was easier come at, but as, by that means, the disposition to revolt would be checked, which might otherwise increase and spread farther. This advice, however, was over-ruled by France, where little regard was had to the Spaniards. It was therefore resolved (upon the arrival of a Courier from France) to begin with the siege of Barcelona. There King Charles himself lay; and, on taking it, all the rest, it was reckoned, would fall. Pursuant to this scheme, the French resolved to send every thing necessary for the siege, and the Count of Toulouse was ordered to lie with the fleet before the place, whilst it was besieged by land. It was concerted to begin the siege in March; for they knew, that, if they began it so early, our fleet could not come in time to relieve the town. But two great storms, that came soon after one another, did so scatter their tartanes, and disable their ships of war, that, as some were cast away, and others much damaged, so they all lost a month's time; and it was not till the 6th of April, that King Philip's army (consisting of thirty-seven battalions, and thirty-one squadrons) opened the trenches before Montjuic, which, through the obstinate resistance of the English and Dutch garrison, and the slowness of the attack, occasioned by the death of the French Engineer Lapara, held out twenty-two days. The French seemed to think, there was no danger of raising the siege, and that therefore they might proceed as slowly as they pleased. The town was under such a consternation, that nothing but King Charles's preference could have kept them from capitulating the first week of the siege. There were some mutinies raised, and some of the Magistrates were killed in them. But the King came among them on all occasions, and both quieted and animated them. After Montjuic was taken, the City was still more pressed. The Earl of Peterborough came from Valencia, and was upon the hills, but could not give them any great assistance (1). Some few from Gironne and other places got into the town. The French Engineers (after Lapara's death) performed their part with little skill and success. The Levant winds were all this while so strong, that it was not possible for Sir John Leake, with the confederate fleet, to come up so soon as was desired. Leake failed from Lisbon in the end of March. He very narrowly missed the Galleons, but he could not pursue them, for he was to lose no time, but haste to Barcelona. His fleet was increased to thirty ships of the line, by the time he got to Gibraltar; but, though twenty more were following him, he would not stay, but hastened on to the relief of the place, as fast as the wind served. But, when their strength, as well as patience, was almost quite exhausted, the wind turned, and Leake arrived on the 8th of May, N. S. As soon as the Count de Toulouse, who with his Squadron had kept the City blocked up by sea, had intelligence that Leake was near him, he sailed back to Toulon. Marshal de Tessé, with King Philip, who was in the camp, but not once named in any action, continued three days before Barcelona, after their fleet failed away. They could then have no hopes of carrying it, unless a storm at sea had kept the Confederate fleet at a distance. At last, the siege was raised on the 12th of May, N. S. with great precipitation, and in much disorder. Their camp was left well furnished, and the sick and wounded

The siege is raised.

(1) Dr. Friend, in his Account of the Earl of Peterborough's conduct in Spain, p. 53. observes, "That the Earl's conduct was as steady in the relief of Barcelona, as it was in the taking of it; and that in this, as in most of the events of the war, his Lordship overcame all the obstacles, that could be thrown in his way by the Ministers of the Spanish Court. As soon as his Lordship perceived, that the enemy's design was upon Barcelona, he ordered some of the troops in Lerida to march, and reinforce that garrison. The King, who was persuaded they would rather make an attempt upon Lerida, countermanded those orders of my Lord, and was so little apprehensive of Barcelona's being in danger, though sufficiently warned of it by letters from his Lordship, that, when the enemy was within five leagues of the town, his Majesty had but five hundred men in it. My Lord, in like manner, was solicited by the Court to abandon Valencia, in order to secure Catalonia, and by the most pressing letters and commands he was urged to such rash and impossible attempts, as must have proved the certain ruin of the forces under his command, and the loss of the King's person. But, in all these distracting and desperate cases, his Lordship, not only took the proper resolutions, but, with a prudence fortunate to himself as well as the public, never omitted to secure the unanimous consent of all in Councils of war, and gave in writing beforehand the reasons, which never failed of being justified by the events. Whilst Barcelona was encompassed by land and sea (after the loss of fort Montjuic) his Lordship found methods to sling five hundred men into the town, which was thought humanly impossible. And he brought the forces, which so much contributed to the relief of the City, without abandoning Valencia, or any foot of ground, that he had gained in Spain. He maintained his post upon the hills for near a fortnight, with about two thousand five hundred men, never above a league or two from the enemy, whom he kept in perpetual alarms. And by the constant vigilance he used, and the exact intelligences he procured, he continued in the neighbourhood of such an army to the last, till he made a march of about seven leagues, with so critical a disposition, that all his foot came in a fleet of boats he had prepared, to the number of three or four hundred, and landed at the same time with the troops, that were on board the navy. The throwing in of so seasonable a reinforcement into Barcelona, under such circumstances, was as great a disgrace, as happened to the French, except that of their rising from before the town immediately after. For the garrison, even with this addition, was not stronger, than when my Lord Peterborough took it with little more than a third part of their army. In order to secure this great advantage, when it should happen, the Earl of Peterborough, notwithstanding all the haste he made from Valencia to Barcelona, had visited, fortified, and secured all the passes behind him, so as to oblige (with an inconceivable number of regular troops, and the country-people) the whole army of Marshal de Tessé intirely to abandon Spain, into which, had my Lord's advice been followed, they had never to this day returned."

In opposition to this account of Dr. Friend, the Author of the Impartial Inquiry into the management of the 1706. wounded could not be carried off. On the day of raising the siege, as the French army was marching off, the sun was eclipsed, and it was total in those parts. And, though no weight is to be laid on such things, yet, the vulgar being apt to look on them as ominous, it was censured as a great error in Marshal Théssé, not to have raised the siege a day sooner; and that the rather, because the French King had made the sun, with a motto, Nec pluribus impar, his device. King Philip made all the haste he could to Perpignan; but his army was almost entirely ruined before he got thither.

Alcantara taken.

At the same time the campaign was opened in Catalonia, it was also begun on the side of Portugal. The Earl of Galway had full powers, and a brave army of about twenty thousand men, well furnished in all respects: He left Badojox behind him, and marched on to Alcantara. The Duke of Berwick had a very small force left him, to defend that frontier: It seems, the French trusted to the interest they had in the Court of Portugal: The Duke's troops were so bad, that he saw, in one small action, that he could not depend on them: He put a good garrison in Alcantara; where their best magazine was laid in. But, when the Earl of Galway came before the town, within three days the garrison, consisting of four thousand men, delivered up the place, and themselves as prisoners of war: The Portuguese would have stopped there, and thought they had made a good campaign, though they had done no more: But the English Ambassador at Lisbon went to the King of Portugal, and pressed him, that orders might be immediately sent to the Earl of Galway to march on: And, when he saw great coldness in some of the Ministers, he threatened a present rupture, if it was not done: And he continued waiting on the King, till the orders were signed, and sent away. Upon receipt of these, the Earl of Galway advanced towards Plaencia, all the country declaring for him, as soon as he appeared; and the Duke of Berwick still retiring before him, not being able to give the least interruption to his march. But, as there was no manner of communication over land between Barcelona and Portugal, when the Earl of Galway had forced a pass at Massagosa, where the enemy had intrenched themselves, and was advanced as far as the bridge of Almaraz, the Portuguese, doubting the issue of the siege of Barcelona, unanimously resolved to engage no farther, till they saw how that siege ended. Accordingly, they ordered their army to march aside to Ciudad Rodrigo, on pretence that it was necessary to secure their frontier, by taking that place. From thence they advanced to Salamanca. But, upon the news of the raising the siege of Barcelona, they marched on towards Madrid, the Duke of Berwick only observing their motions, and still retiring before them. King Philip went with great expedition, and a very small train from Perpignan to Navarre; and from thence post to Madrid, on the 6th of June; but finding, that he had no army, which he could trust to, the Grandees being now retired, and looking as so many dead men; and he seeing, that the Portuguese were still advancing, sent his Queen to Burgos, and followed her in a few days, carrying with him what was valuable in his palace; and, it seems, he despaired of ever returning thither again, since he destroyed all that he could not carry away; in which he acted a very extraordinary part, for he did some of this with his own hand, as was universally believed at Madrid.*

* Burnet.

The

the war in Spain, p. 81. observes, That, however the Doctor boasts of the Earl of Peterborough's intelligence, yet it does not appear, from his orders or letters of that date, that he was under any apprehensions for Barcelona, on the 19th of March 1705-6, O. S. though the enemy invested it within three days after; the Earl's orders being for the fleet and forces to come to Altea or Denia; though, before the Admiral received those orders, he received letters from the King of Spain and Prince Lichtenstein, of the 26th of March, of a very different import; wherein the Admiral is desired to come to Barcelona with all possible diligence with the ships, troops, and money, which the Queen of Great-Britain designed for King Charles's service and the relief of Catalonia. But, by the 7th of April, N. S. the Earl's eyes seem likewise to have been opened; but the news appeared to have been a perfect surprize to him; for, in his letter to Sir John Leake from Valencia of that date, he talks of the relief of Barcelona as a matter desperate, and would compound for the safety of the King's person. It appears likewise, that his Lordship was still of opinion, that all the forces, ammunition, and money should be landed at Denia, Altea, or the grove of Valencia; and his letter to Sir John Leake, of the 22d of April, shews, that he was even then of opinion, that the forces should be landed no nearer than Tarragona, except a thousand men to be put on board the men of war, in order to be thrown into Barcelona by sea, if it should be requisite; so that it might justly be said, that the Admiral relieved Barcelona, if not contrary, at least not pursuant, to the Earl's method. It cannot indeed be denied, that his Lordship had got some troops ready in small embarkations off of Vineros or Maitore, to take the opportunity of slipping them into the town under the protection of the fleet; and that he came on board Sir John Leake from the same place, and hoisted his Union-flag at the main-top-mast-head; but all the measures, for the relief of Barcelona, had already been concerted, and in a manner executed. For Sir George Byng, Sir John Jennings, and Admiral Wassenaer made sail before the fleet, cast anchor in the road, and by Sir George Byng's order a good body of forces were actually thrown into the town, before one half of the fleet knew, that the Earl of Peterborough was aboard, who indeed, upon his arrival at Barcelona, thought proper to approve of what Sir George Byng had directed. Upon the whole, the Author of the Impartial Inquiry concludes, that notwithstanding Dr. Friend "has attributed so great a share of the relief of Barcelona to the Earl of Peterborough; it is evident he knew nothing of the enemy's design upon that place three days before they had actually invested it: Five days after he knew the town was besieged, his Lordship was of opinion for landing all the succours in the Kingdom of Valencia; and twenty days after, no nearer than Tarragona. Now to say nothing of the unparalleled dispatch made by Sir John Leake and Sir George Byng in bringing the fleet and succours to the relief of Barcelona in so critical a time, contrary to my Lord Peterborough's opinion; let any indifferent person judge, whether that place had ever been taken, if his Lordship's opinion in the fleet to deny the assistance of the seamen, and his haste to be going into Italy, had been complied with; or, if it had ever been relieved, if his Lordship's orders had been obeyed, which were directly opposite to the King of Spain's interest and desires."
No. 48. VOL. III.

1706. The capital City being thus abandoned, the Earl of Galway came to it by the end of June. He met with no resistance indeed, but with as little welcome. An army of Portuguese with an Heretic at their head, was certainly a very strange sight to the Catholics, who retained all the pride, without any of the courage of their ancestors. They thought it below them, to make their submissions to any but King Charles himself; and if he had come thither immediately, it was believed, that the entire reduction of Spain would have been soon effected. It is not certain what made him stay so long as he did at Barcelona, from the beginning of May till near the end of July (1). Those about him pretended, that it was not fit to go to Madrid, 1706. The Earl of Galway comes there, but King Charles delays too long his coming thither.

till he was well furnished with money to make a decent entry. General Stanhope offered to furnish him with what was necessary for the journey, but could not afford a magnificent equipage for a solemn entry. The King wrote a very pressing letter to the Duke of Marlborough, representing his great necessities, and desiring greater supplies. The Duke sent over this letter to the Lord-Treasurer; but little regard was had to it, because it was suggested from many different hands, that the Prince of Lichtenstein was enriching himself, and keeping his King poor. Others pretended that the true cause of the delay was a secret amour of the King's at Barcelona. But whatever the cause was, the effects proved fatal. It was first proposed, that he should

(1) The Earl of Galway in his Narrative, observes, That, if the Portuguese had marched directly to Madrid from the bridge of Almaraz, after they had forced a pass at Maffagena, where the enemy had intrenched themselves, as the Generals of the Allies would have persuaded them, "in all probability, says he, we should have arrived there at the same time with the news of the Duke of Anjou's being returned to France; the Dukes must have been obliged to escape alone, and the tribunals being still there, it is very likely the war would have been over. Some of the Portuguese were willing to go back, and besiege Badajoz, which was intirely laying aside all thoughts of Madrid; but others for attacking Ciudad Roderigo; and, by joining with those, I engaged them, after the taking of that place, to go Madrid. But the time, which was lost on this occasion, had given the Duke of Anjou an opportunity of returning from France to Madrid, from whence he withdrew the Court, and all the Tribunals, before the army could reach that place; so that, upon our arrival there, we found Madrid an open village; and the troops having been extremely weakened by so long a march, were not above forty thousand horse and eight or ten thousand foot. The Portuguese Generals, and those of the Allies, thought it highly necessary the King of Spain should come to Madrid as soon as possible. For, besides the advantage his presence might have been to his own affairs, it was of the last importance to us, to be immediately joined by the forces with the King, and under the Earl of Peterborough's command, not being strong enough without them to attack the Duke of Anjou, who had already received some succours from France, besides the five thousand five hundred horse and eight thousand foot, of which the Duke of Berwick's army consisted, after he had been joined by the Conde de las Torres. Being perfectly informed of the enemy's strength, and motions, and having great reasons to believe, that if we were joined in time by all the forces with the King and the Earl of Peterborough, we might, in this favourable conjuncture, drive the Duke of Anjou intirely out of Spain, make ourselves absolute masters of that Kingdom, and put an end to an expensive war; all the while we lay at Madrid and Guadalaxara, I dispatched every day one or more expresses, and the greatest part of them Officers, with letters to the King of Spain and to my Lord Peterborough, representing to them both the importance of our being joined forthwith, and earnestly desiring that no time might be lost in improving so critical a juncture. As the next best method to advise our friends of our arrival at Madrid, the first Gazette day after we got thither, I caused it to be published in the Gazette, that we were there, and expected in a very few days to be joined by the King and the Earl of Peterborough, hoping, that the natural curiosity of the Spaniards would give a printed news-paper a free passage. But, notwithstanding all the diligence, that was used in this matter on our part, near six weeks were elapsed at Madrid and Guadalaxara, before we received any advice, that the King was upon his march to join us; and, in the mean time, the Duke of Anjou's army was so much increased by daily reinforcements from several parts, that he was now become superior in number to us, even after we were joined by those forces, which the King and my Lord Peterborough brought along with them. And I must say, that it is the general opinion, and I do verily believe, as the Portuguese lost one fair opportunity of putting an end to the war, by not marching directly from the bridge of Almaraz to Madrid; so we lost another, for want of being joined in time by the forces under the command of the King of Spain and the Earl of Peterborough. And whereas that noble Lord is pleased to aver, that he never received any advice from me of my arrival at Madrid with the Portuguese, and as an argument of my neglect of him on that subject, produces an instance of one Officer, that happened to pass through his quarters with letters from me to the King, and none for his Lordship, I am obliged to observe, that I gave this Officer an hundred pistoles, and ordered him to go directly to the King of Spain, who then lay at Saragossa; but he was accidentally forced to go out of his way to avoid one of the enemy's parties, which was the true occasion of his passing thro' the Earl of Peterborough's quarters at Valencia, contrary to his first intention. But several other Officers, who were dispatched by me to the Earl, assured me, they had the honour to deliver him those letters, which I writ his Lordship from Madrid and Guadalaxara. And, even taking the fact to be as the Earl of Peterborough is pleased to state it himself, it is plain, his Lordship had at least some verbal informations from that very Officer, that passed thro' his Lordship's quarters, and consequently could not be altogether ignorant, either of the place, where the Portuguese army lay, or of the necessity of joining them without loss of time. After the General had got King Charles proclaimed at Madrid, it was thought fit to advance to Guadalaxara, where we had at last advice, that the King was coming to join us; and, at the same time, we were informed, that the Duke of Anjou was at Guadalaxara, to which place we marched to prevent the enemy from intercepting the King. Upon our approach the Duke of Anjou repassed the river; which little advantage we contented ourselves with, for it was not thought advisable to follow and attack him on the other side, being advantageously posted, and stronger than we. We staid here two days, and, when we thought the King was out of danger, we again retired to Guadalaxara, where we were joined by his Majesty and my Lord of Peterborough, with two regiments of Spanish dragoons, and part of Pierce's; for his Lordship had left behind him, in several places, thirteen battalions of Pierce's, and two other entire regiments of dragoons. So soon as the armies were joined (having, upon my arrival at Madrid, sent Captain Montague, to give 1706. should march through Valencia, as the nearest and much the safest way; and he came on that design as far as Tarragona. But, advice being brought him there, that the Kingdom of Aragon was in a good disposition to declare for him, he was diverted from his first intentions, and prevailed on to go to Saragossa, where he was acknowledged by both Kingdoms: But he lost much time, and more in the reputation of his arms, by delaying so long to move towards Madrid; so that King Philip recovered his spirits, and returned from Burgos to Madrid. The Earl of Galway was very uneasy at this slow motion, which King Charles made. King Philip had some more troops sent him from France; and, the broken bodies of his army being now brought together, he had an army equal in numbers to the Earl of Galway, and marched up to him; but, since so much depended upon the issue of an action, the Earl of Galway avoided it, because he expected every day reinforcements to be brought him, both by King Charles; and by the Earl of Peterborough from Valencia. In order therefore to facilitate this conjunction, he moved towards Aragon; so that Madrid was again left to be possessed by King Philip. At last, in the beginning of August, King Charles came up, but with a very inconsiderable force. A few days after, the Earl of Peterborough came also with an escort, rather than its strength, for he had not with him above five hundred dragoons. He was now uneasy, because he could

"give the Queen an account of our march, and to desire her Majesty's leave to retire) I waited upon my Lord Peterborough, offering him the command of the English, and to receive his orders, till I should have the Queen's leave to go home. But, because the Marquis de Minas would not do so too, my Lord Peterborough chose not to stay with the army, and within a few days after went away." But let us see what the Earl of Peterborough says on his part, in his answer to the second question proposed to him by the House of Lords on the 5th of January 1710-11, in these terms, That the Earl of Peterborough may acquaint the House of what he knows of the Earl of Galway's proceedings, during his stay with the army at Madrid, his march to Guadaluara, and his retreat to Valencia; and, if he knows any thing of the opposition made by the King of Spain, the Count de Noyelles, and the Spanish Ministers and Generals, to those measures?

To this the Earl answered, "That, from the time the Earl of Galway came first into Spain as far as Almaras, and thence returned back into Portugal, the Earl of Peterborough had no advices from the Earl of Galway, no account of the motives of that retreat, or any hopes given him of the return of the Portuguese into Spain. That, after the raising of the siege of Barcelona, and the retreat of the French army out of Catalonia, the Earl of Peterborough received no letter or message from the Earl of Galway after his second entrance into Spain, nor had the least notice of his situation, circumstances, or designs, till he saw his troops retreating from the enemy to take the strong camp of Guadaluara; though the marches of the King from Aragon, and those of the Earl of Peterborough from Valencia, were well known in the Portugal camp. That two several Officers, sent by my Lord Galway, came to Valencia, and brought no letters to the Earl of Peterborough, one of them demanding money for the pursuit of his journey. That, as to the persons, who advised the King to go by Aragon, and not by Valencia, he knows no farther (being at that time absent from his Majesty) but that, having ever extremely opposed it, and having writ to the Secretary of State at his first coming to Valencia against it, he received an answer to this purpose, that he hoped the Earl of Peterborough would bear the mortification and disappointment with patience, since the King was so resolved; and a messenger by the appointed token, known to be sent by my Lord Galway, had given notice, that the said Earl expected the King by the way of Aragon, and had given to understand how every thing was prepared for his reception that way." The third question proposed to the Earl of Peterborough was in these terms: That the Earl of Peterborough acquaint the House what advices his Lordship received from the Earl of Galway at Madrid, in order to concert any public measures? And what his Lordship knows of the reasons, that induced the King of Spain to go by Arragon towards Madrid, and not by Valencia? To which he answered, "That the

"Earl of Galway continued about forty days at Madrid, without making any endeavours to augment his troops, or provide any magazines for the subsistence of his army. That, meeting the enemy unexpectedly, and retreating to the camp of Guadaluara, the troops were without provisions, and in the greatest disorder. That the measures taken in that retreat, where five thousand men were lost without a blow, and their whole cavalry ruined, were all positively against the King's opinion, and that of all Officers and Ministers. That the Earl of Peterborough had the accounts he gives from the King of Spain's own mouth, and several of his Generals; and it will particularly appear by letters from Count Noyelles, Velt-Marshal of the Emperor, and General to the King of Spain, and from Mr. Stanhope; which letters the Earl is ready to produce. And that it is notorious to the whole world, that, if the Earl of Galway had pursued the enemy ten days longer towards the Ebro, all the horde under the Marshal of Berwick had deserted to King Charles, and the French could never have return'd to Spain."

The Earl of Galway, in his reply, to the Earl of Peterborough's answers to the five questions proposed to him by the Lords, speaks thus: "In his Lordship's answer to the second question, he is pleased to aver, That from the time the Earl of Galway came first into Spain as far as Almaras, and thence returned back into Portugal, the Earl of Peterborough had no advices from the Earl of Galway, no account of the motives of that retreat, or any hopes given him of the return of the Portuguese into Spain. What his Lordship says upon this occasion is very true; for, whilst he was at so great a distance besieged in Barcelona, and the Duke of Berwick with a considerable body of horse between him and us, it was to no purpose to think of sending dispatches by land: Neither was it necessary to inform the enemy that way, that the Portuguese were resolved, (notwithstanding the repeated instances of the foreign Generals to the contrary) to return back again to their own country, after their army had advanced as far as the bridge of Almaras. But, when we got to Madrid, I immediately sent so many exprests with letters, both to the Earl of Peterborough and the King of Spain, that it was morally impossible his Lordship could have been ignorant above eight days of our arrival there. And I have since been assured by the inhabitants of Barcelona, that they were all informed of it by that time; from whence I must conclude, that his Lordship's delays in joining with us were voluntary, and not occasioned by want of intelligence. I have asserted in the Narrative which I delivered in to this most honourable House, that I do verily believe, if the Portuguese army had been joined in time, after their arrival at Madrid, by the forces with the King of Spain, and under the command of the Earl of Peterborough, we might have been able to have driven the Duke of Anjou out of Spain, and have put an end to an expensive war. Nor was this my opinion only, but that of all the world at that time."

"And

not have the supreme command, both the Earl of Galway and Count Noyelles being much ancienter Officers than he was. But, to deliver him from the uneasiness of being commanded by them, the Queen had sent him the powers of an Ambassador Extraordinary; and he took that character on him for a few days. His complaining so much as he did, of the Prince of Lichtenstein and the Germans, who were still possessed of King Charles's confidence, made him very unacceptable to that King; so that he, without waiting for orders from the Queen, withdrew from the camp, and sailed away in one of the Queen's ships to Genoa. The English fleet lay all the summer in the Mediterranean, which obliged the French to keep theirs within Toulon. Carthagena declared for King Charles, and was secured by some of our ships. The fleet came before Alicant: The seamen landed and stormed the town: The castle held out some weeks; but then capitulated, and the soldiers, by articles, were obliged to march to Cadiz. Soon after that, our fleet sailed out of the Streights, one Squadron was sent to the West-Indies; another was to

“ And I find his Lordship thinks it so far imports him to be clear of this imputation, that he is resolved to be rid of it at any rate. For certainly nothing less than an apprehension of this nature could have made him aver a fact so improbable as that, where, in his farther answer to the same question, he says, That he received no letter, no message from the Earl of Galway, after his second entrance into Spain; nor had the least notice of his situation, circumstances, or designs, till he saw his troops retreating from the enemy, to take the strong camp of Guadalaxara. Now what could be the design of his Lordship's marching to Guadalaxara with so small a body of troops, as is mentioned in my narrative, unless he knew he was to meet us there? Besides, his Lordship forgets, that he came not to Guadalaxara, till some days after the Portuguese had been actually encamped there, as I can make appear by the oath of several Officers; and consequently it was impossible for him to have seen us retreating thither. I believe it may be necessary upon this occasion to repeat, that, when his Lordship did join us, he brought no more English troops with him than one regiment of dragoons, and a detachment of another, though he had actually at that time under his command in Spain thirteen English battalions and four regiments of dragoons; as likewise, that the Officer, who (his Lordship says) passed through his quarters with letters for the King of Spain, and none for him, was never designed to have gone within several leagues of his Lordship, unless he had been obliged to it by a party of the enemy, as I have already explained more at large in my narrative. And I cannot help observing, it is very improbable, that that Officer should have had occasion to apply to the Earl's Secretary for money, because I gave him an hundred pistoles at the time I dispatched him. In his Lordship's answer to the third question, he is pleased to say, That the Earl of Galway continued about forty days at Madrid, without making any endeavours to augment his troops, or provide any magazines for the subsistence of his army; that, meeting the enemy unexpectedly, and retreating to the camp of Guadalaxara, the troops were without provisions, and in the greatest disorder. In reply to this paragraph, I do affirm, that the Portuguese staid no longer time at Madrid than was necessary to get the King proclaimed there, which did not exceed ten days; then advanced as far as Guadalaxara, and afterwards to Guadaraxa, about sixty miles beyond Madrid, where we obliged part of the Duke of Anjou's troops to repass the river, but were not willing to engage them at a time, when we had reason to expect we should have been joined in a very few days by the forces with the King of Spain and Earl of Peterborough, which was the only secure method left us to augment our troops; for it would have been very imprudent to have attempted to form corps of the Castilians, who were intirely devoted to the Duke of Anjou's interest. But all the Officers of the army knew we were so far from wanting provisions ourselves, that we sent a convoy of eight thousand livres to meet the King and Earl of Peterborough, which, by their delay in not advancing fast enough grew mouldy, and was afterwards pillaged by the peasants. His Lordship's information of our want

“ of intelligence of the enemies motions, and of our disorder upon the retreat, are as great mistakes as the former; for the occasion of our advancing to Guadaraxa was purely to post ourselves in such a manner, as to prevent the enemy from marching or sending detachments to intercept the King of Spain; and, when we had reason to believe him out of danger, we returned to Guadalaxara, there to be joined by the King and Earl of Peterborough. Nor was it possible for his Lordship to have seen our disorder, had there been any, because, as I have already observed, he came not to Guadalaxara himself, till some days after we had been incamped there. Notwithstanding the Earl of Peterborough is pleased to say, That we left five thousand men in the return to Valencia, without a blow, and intirely ruined our whole cavulry; it is certain, our loss upon that occasion was very considerable, if any; and the retreat made in so good order, that the enemy (superior as they were in number) never durst venture to attack us, after the warm reception twenty-two of their squadrons met with from two battalions under the command of Colonel Wade, in the town of Villa Nova, notwithstanding we were obliged to cross plains and rivers in their view. And though his Lordship avers, in his answer to this question, That this retreat was made against the King's opinion, and that of all his Officers, and Ministers, it is certain, the retreat was concerted and agreed upon in a Council of war. It is true, some persons about the King seemed at first inclinable to have taken quarters in Castile; but that was soon after found impracticable; for none of those squadrons, who were best acquainted with the country, could make a disposition of quarters, where the troops could be secure; and therefore it was resolved immediately to cross the Tagus, before the approaching rains should have rendered the fords impracticable; which being done, our next design was to have lodged ourselves behind the river Xucar. But neither could this be done without taking a small town with a castle upon that river, that commanded a bridge, where the enemy had a garrison; and therefore a disposition was made for attacking this town: But, by the delay of the King's Generals, the execution of this matter was so long deferred, that the enemy had already reinforced their garrison, and were advanced so near with a superior force, that it was not thought advisable to attempt the place. Thus the only resource left us was the Kingdom of Valencia, whither we were absolutely obliged to retreat, that we might preserve our communication with the seas, and caution with security. Nor is it to be wondered, that Count Noyelles, in his letter to the Earl of Peterborough, should seem dissatisfied with the measures, that were then taken, since it is well known, that General used underhand to ridicule those very opinions in Councils of war, to which he had given his own assent. For being disappointed of the command of the army (which was what he expected at his first arrival) he seemed resolved, that no other General should have an army to command.”

The Reader, who has an inclination to see a larger detail of the conduct of the Earls of Peterborough and Galway, may compare Dr. Friend's Account of the former

After King Charles had joined the Earl of Galway, King Philip's army and his looked on one another for some time, but without venturing on any action. They were near an equality, and both sides expected to be reinforced; so that, in this uncertainty, neither side would put any thing to the hazard.

former with the Impartial Inquiry into the management of the town in Spain; which latter piece is a confutation of the Earl of Peterborough's Historian, supported by a great number of original papers; among which, is a Memorial of Count Galar to Queen Anne, dated 27 of August 1706, shewing "the true and principal reason, why his Catholic Majesty was so long detained at Barcelona, and obliged to chuse the way of Saragossa, rather than that of Valencia, in order to his going to Madrid, and to expose himself to all the inconveniences, which the delay of his arrival in the said City might have occasioned." Which reason is charged upon the Earl of Peterborough. For after it had been agreed, that the Earl should embark some troops, and transport them to Valencia, whether his Majesty would go by land with the rest of the forces designed for that disposition, after which they would march jointly to Madrid, the Earl, instead of giving the King any assistance or relief, represented the way by Valencia to be almost impracticable, and intimated that by Saragossa; so that his Majesty, having nothing to hope for from the Earl, and finding it impossible for him to carry his troops so far through an enemy's country, without any means of subsisting them, was obliged to accept of the offer of the inhabitants of Arragon, who had newly declared for him, and invited him thither. "It is true, says the Memorial, that my Lord Peterborough, when he had warning given him, that he would become answerable for the inconveniences, that such an alteration of the route might produce, afterwards wrote to the King, as appears by his letter of the 5th of July, that he had found all that was necessary for his Majesty's occasions: But he did not do it before it was too late, and till such time as his Majesty was already upon the road to Saragossa; which obliged him to return the following answer to the said Lord:

"You represent to me the importance of my going immediately to Madrid, and propose to me the way to Reguena, as the shortest and surest from infultu. You tell me the dispositions, both of men and money, you have now made for accompanying my person; and further offer me to come to me to concert the rest, which might contribute to the good success of this undertaking; for which I am very much obliged to you. But, being upon the road to Arragon, and engaged to pursue my march that way, I am willing to tell you the chief reasons that have induced and obliged me to take such a resolution. Several of your former letters mention the concern you were in, that you could not supply me with any money: That your foot was almost entirely ruined and useless: That you could not find mules for the baggage: And that, in short, you could not make one step in such a juncture for my service. To this you farther added an account, that, in my passage through the Kingdom of Valencia, I should want every thing; and therefore, having not the necessary funds to defray the expence of the journey, the troops I should bring would be ruined in a short time, and my person exposed to great inconveniences and disadvantages. So that, seeing the inclination and fidelity, which the Kingdom of Arragon began to shew towards us, I took the resolution, out of necessity, to turn this way, where I hope, from a country abounding in provisions, for a subsistence for my retinue and my troops, besides the supplies, which my faithful subjects may present me. With this prospect I ordered some regiments to march to the frontiers, where I now am; and the Province having ordered it so, that Saragossa, solved to pursue his designs in Italy, where the Duke of Orleans (upon Vendosme's being placed at the head of the French army in Flanders) was sent to command, with Marshal Marsin to assist, or rather to govern him. As all the preparations for the siege of Turin were made, and as it was thought impossible for Prince Eugene to attempt the relief of that place, the siege was begun in May, and continued till the beginning of September (1). The French were of Turin.

"the Capital, has openly declared for me; it seems becoming my Royal Dignity to go myself, and take possession of that Crown; and the rather, since by the same way I can advance towards Madrid, and, making use of the favourable conjuncture, join with the King of Portugal's army; not doubting but the Generals of the Allies, that command it, will send some detachments forward to cover, as I desire, my march to that Capital, being resolved to make but a short stay at Saragossa, and then to march that way, which will be thought most secure and practicable; whereas I shall forthwith give you notice, in order to regulate afterwards the route, which the troops from Reguena, or the neighbourhood, are to take, in order either to meet me, or to secure elsewhere my passage. I am willing to believe the road by Reguena is free; but yet I wonder, that by so easy a way you receive no news from my Lord Galway, since there is nothing, that can hinder the communication on that side.

"Besides the reasons contained in this answer, there was yet another, which does not carry less force in it than those, viz. That his Catholic Majesty could repose little confidence in these promises, having fresh in his memory the example of what happened at his departure from Lisbon, when the Earl, to engage his Catholic Majesty to leave that place, assured him, that he should want for nothing: That he had forty thousand pistoles, whereof eight thousand had been given him by your Majesty; the remainder being his own money, besides an unlimited credit upon Genoa and Lisbon. But scarce were they arrived in Catalonia, when his Lordship, instead of giving any money, demanded some, and obliged his Catholic Majesty to borrow, and advance to him wherewithal to make his first expedition into Valencia. His Catholic Majesty hopes, that your Majesty will be fully convinced by this relation, the truth of which is made evident by the said Lord's own letters hereto annexed, and by the King's answers, that it was through mere unavoidable necessity, that his Catholic Majesty did not set out sooner from Barcelona, and took the way by Saragossa, instead of that by Valencia."

The Earl of Sunderland likewise, in a letter to the Earl of Peterborough, dated at Whitehall, Decemb. 18, 1707, has the following passage:

"As to your Lordship's answer to the second head, her Majesty is by no means satisfied with it, because it does appear by the date of your letter to the King of Spain, and from Mr. Stanhope's letter to you, to which you refer, that you did not, after coming to Barcelona, solicit or press the King of Spain to go by way of Valencia till after he had taken the resolution of going by Saragossa, which resolution was also occasioned by the discouragements you had given him from going by way of Valencia for want of money, carriages, and all necessaries for the army."

(1) Turin, a strong and splendid City of Italy, with a fine castle; the Marquise of the Principality of Piedmont, in the territory of Turin; an Archbishoprick and University, subject to the Duke of Savoy, and his Seat. The French besieged it very vigorously the present campaign, and reduced it to great extremities: But, September the 7th, the Duke of Savoy, and Prince
9 G Eugene,

1706. in hopes, that the taking of Turin, with the intricate reduction of Piedmont, of which they seemed secure, would compensate their other losses. They boasted they had formed an army, under the Duke de la Feuillade, for that enterprize, consisting of sixty-eight battalions and eighty-eight squadrons, two hundred and fifty Officers of artillery, eight hundred gunners, two hundred and fifty bombardiers and miners, and four thousand pioneers; and that they had also provided for the siege a hundred and sixty pieces of heavy cannon, eighty mortars, a hundred thousand bullets, twenty-seven thousand bombs, one million and one hundred thousand pounds weight of powder, three hundred thousand weight of lead, eighty thousand grenades, &c. all which were laid up in the magazines of Casal, Crescentino, and Cbiras. On the other hand, the Duke of Savoy, who was resolved to defend the place to the last extremity, added new works to the fortifications. The French King, at the same time, used all possible methods to induce him to abandon the Allies, by not only offering him the Government of the Milanese for his life, but several millions of livres for repairing his fortified places, that had been demolished. But he rejected those proposals, and declared his resolution to adhere firmly to the interest of the Grand Alliance. The French King therefore determined to reduce him (if possible) by force, and immediately dispatched his orders to the Duke de la Feuillade, to form the siege of Turin with the utmost diligence. Accordingly, he caused the lines of circumvallation and contravallation to be carried on; and the latter being finished by the 30th of May, N.S. and the other on the 2d of June, the trenches were opened the same night, both against the town and citadel. The Duke, having the next day viewed the enemy's works, ordered the guards in the citadel, and at the gate Suza, to be doubled, and gave other necessary directions for the defence of the place; and, on the 6th of June, gave orders for the planting of sixty pieces of cannon on the bastion de la Consolare, near the citadel, and upon some other works. The next day, the Duke de la Feuillade sent Monsieur de Marignan, his Quarter-Master-General, with a Trumpet to the grand guard, to acquaint the Duke, "That he had received orders from Court, to form the siege of Turin; and, at the same time, to have all imaginable regard to the Royal family there, and offer to them passports, with a guard, before the siege was begun." In answer to which, the Duke sent word, "That he was very much obliged to the King for his offer: That he did not think at present to remove his family: That, whenever he should remove them, he should have no occasion for a pass or a guard: And that he might execute his Master's orders, and begin the siege when he thought fit." On the 8th of June, therefore, the Besiegers began to bombard the citadel and town, and continued the three following days without doing any considerable damage; and, at the same time, the Besieged fired incessantly from their mortars, cannon, and small arms, which very much disturbed the enemy in their works, who, on the 15th, at night, began to fire on the Besieged red-hot bullets, most of which fell near the Duke's palace, but did very little harm. The next day, the two Dutcheffes, with the young Prince and Princesses, left Turin, and went to Quierasco; and the Duke of Savoy having received advice, that the enemy were marching towards Montcalier, in order entirely to surround Turin, he left his capital on the 18th, and, going to Carmagnole, put himself at the head of his horse, whence he sent six hundred of them under General Marigni to Montcalier; but, on the 20th, the enemy's forces on this side the Po advancing thither, that General was forced to retire. On the 21st, Mr. Melbuen, Envoy Extraordinary from the Queen of Great-Britain to the Duke of Savoy, came from Genoa by the way of Oneglia to Carmagnole, where he had audience of the Duke. But that night, the Duke receiving advice, that the enemy had laid a bridge over the Po at Montcalier, and intended to march that way the next morning, orders were given for decamping by break of day; and the Duke marched from Carmagnole to Quierasco, and there passed the Stura, being closely pursued by the enemy, who attempted several times to put his rear into disorder, but were as often repulsed, and the Duke made an orderly retreat. Soon after, he received intelligence, that the enemy were advancing to attack Quierasco, whereupon he removed the Dutcheffes and Princes to Mondovi, being accompanied, at the Duke's request, by the Sieur Vander Meer, Envoy Extraordinary from the States-General. From thence they removed to Ceva; but, the Duke imagining they were not safe there, he ordered them to retire into the territories of Genoa, where, after many inconveniencies and dangers, they safely arrived about the middle of July.

The Duke de la Feuillade, being wearied in the pursuit of the Duke of Savoy, returned, the 5th of July, to the camp before Turin, to receive the Duke of Orleans (who was come to take the command) leaving forty-five squadrons, under the Count d' Aubeterre, with orders to pursue the Duke of Savoy: Which pursuit proved advantageous to his Royal Highness; for, from the 10th of June to the 15th of July, great part of the forces, employed in the siege of Turin, being engaged in this service, it not only very much retarded the progress of the siege, but gave Prince Eugene an opportunity at last to come up time enough to relieve the place, in hopes of which relief, though the siege was vigorously pushed on, it was as bravely defended. However, on the 4th of August, the enemy attacked the first counterescarp of the citadel, and took it after a stout resistance, which lasted for about three hours, having twenty Officers, three Engineers, and three hundred men killed, besides four hundred wounded in the action. After this, they

Eugene, relieved it, gaining a complete victory over their enemies. It stands in a very fruitful pleasant plain, on the river Po, twenty miles nigh East of Pignerol, seventy-eight almost West of Genoa and Milan, a hundred almost East of Grenoble and Cambray, a hundred and twenty South-east of Geneva, a hundred and fifty four almost South of Lyon, two hundred and fifty West of Venice, three hundred and sixty South-east of Paris, three hundred and forty North-west of Rome, and four hundred and sixty South-west of Vienne.

1706. they continued to perfect their lodgments and batteries; but the besieged sprung so many mines, that they had no batteries ready till the 21st. On the 25th, in the morning, the besieged sprung a mine, which buried several men, blew up nine pieces of cannon, and threw down three out of five batteries, which were on the covered way. On the 26th, in the night, the half-moon and counter-guards were attacked and carried by the Besiegers; but those, who defended the half-moon, retired into a walled redoubt at the neck of it, and from thence to the flank of the bastions, and made such a terrible fire upon the enemy for three hours together, that, the next morning, they drove them from the counter-guards with much slaughter, that they owned themselves, they had in those attacks near five hundred men killed. On the 28th of August, the Duke of Orleans arrived in the camp with forty squadrons, eleven regiments of dragoons, and forty battalions. The Besiegers, encouraged by these reinforcements, on the last of August, made a second assault upon the half-moon, and the two counter-guards before the citadel, but were repulsed with greater loss than before; the Besieged making a terrible fire with their small arms, and springing several mines with extraordinary success; for, of seven batteries, some of five, others of six pieces of cannon, which the Besiegers had on the covered way, not one was left, the mines of the Besieged having ruined them all. But, though the French lost about fourteen thousand men before the place, yet the ammunition of the Besieged was now so far spent, that they must have capitulated within a day or two, if they had not been relieved by Prince Eugene, who made all possible haste for that purpose. The Court of Vienna had not given due orders, as they had undertaken, for the provision of the troops, which were to march through their Country to join him. This occasioned many complaints and some delay. The truth was, that Court was so much set on the reduction of Hungary, that all other things were much neglected, while that alone seemed to possess them. A treaty was set on foot with the malecontents there by the mediation of England and the States-General; and a cessation of arms was agreed to for two months. All, who belonged to that Court, were very uneasy, while the cessation continued: They had shared among them the confiscations of all the great estates in Hungary; and they saw, that, if a peace were made, all these would be vacated, and the estates would be restored to their former owners; for which reason, they took all possible means to traverse the negotiation, and inflame the Emperor. There seemed to be some probability of bringing things to a settlement; but that could not be brought to any conclusion, during the term of the cessation; and, when that was elapsed, the Emperor could not be prevailed on to renew it. He recalled his troops from the Upper Rhine, though that was contrary to all his agreements with the Empire. Notwithstanding all this ill management of the Court of Vienna, Prince Eugene got together the greatest part of those troops, which he expected in the Veronese, before the beginning of June. They were not yet all come up; but he, believing himself strong enough, resolved to advance; and he left the Prince of Hesse with a body to receive the rest, and by them to force a diversion, while he was going on. The Duke of Vendosme had taken care of all the fords of the Adige, the Mincio, and the Oglio; and had cast up such lines and entrenchments every where, that he had assured the Court of France it was not possible for Prince Eugene to break through all that opposition, at least to do it in any time to relieve Turin. By this time the Duke of Orleans was come to take the army out of the Duke of Vendosme hands; but, before Vendosme had left it, they saw, that he had reckoned wrong in all those hopes, which he had given the Court of France of stopping Prince Eugene's march. For, in the beginning of July, that Prince sent a few battalions over one of the fords of the Adige, where the French were well posted, and double their number, who yet ran away with such precipitation, that they left every thing behind them. Upon that the Prince passed the Adige with his whole army, and the French in a consternation retired behind the Mincio. After this the Prince surprized the French with a motion, which they had not looked for, nor prepared against, for he passed the Po. The Duke of Orleans followed him, but declined an engagement; whereupon Prince Eugene wrote to the Duke of Marlborough, that he felt the effects of the battle of Ramillies, even in Italy, the French seeming to be every where dispirited with their misfortunes. Prince Eugene, marching nearer the Appennines, had gained some march of the Duke of Orleans, who, upon re-passing the Po, and advanced with his army towards Turin, that he took no care of at Stradella, which might have been kept and disputed for some days. Prince Eugene found no opposition there; nor did he meet with any other difficulty, but from the length of the march, and the heat of the season, for he was in motion all the months of July and August. At last, after having passed four great rivers, which served for ditches to the four intrenchments, which the enemy had made to hinder his passage, and, after thirty four marches, his army arrived near Turin on the 30th of August. On the 1st of September, Prince Eugene, joined by the Duke of Savoy with his horse, and the whole army, passed the Po, on the 4th, between Montcalier and Carignan towards Quers; and four battalions and ten thousand militia were left under the command of Count Sanienna, with a certain quantity of powder to be thrown into Turin, in case the enemy should quit the hill, to oppose the confederate army with all their forces. On the 5th, the Confederates incamped near the Doria, and, the Duke of Savoy having intelligence, that a convoy of one thousand three hundred mules was coming from Suza, he caused the Marquis de Visconti to pass the ford of Elpignan with the first line of the left wing, and the Marquis de Langallerie to pass below Pianessa with the horse of the second line of the same wing, and so the convoy, being then come into the neighbourhood of that town, was inclosed between them. Monsieur de Bonel, who commanded the guard of the convoy, was beaten, and the regiment of Chatillon intirely defeated. That day eight hundred loaded mules were taken; and at night the cattle of Pianessa, into which the rest of the convoy, and of the regiment of Chatillon, had escaped, surrendered with its garrison (consisting of eighty foot) at discretion. On the 6th, the Confederates passed the 1706. the Doria, and incamped with the right on the bank of that river before Pianessa, and the left on the Stura before the Venerie. At night all the troops were ordered to be ready to fight the next day, which order was received with inexpressible joy. On the 7th, at day-break, they marched to the enemy, who were intrenched up to the teeth, having the Stura on their right, the Doria on their left, and the convent of Capuchins de Notre Dame de la Campagne in the center; besides Lusingo and several other fortified Casines flanked their intrenchment. The Confederate foot marched in eight columns, four in the first line, and as many in the second, and all the grenadiers of each column in the van. The artillery was divided in proportion among the foot. The right moved along the side of the Doria, and the left along the Stura. Behind the foot marched the horse; the first line in six columns, and the second in brigades. Never was any thing seen so bold and terrible as this march. The enemy fired continually with forty pieces of cannon; but all the fire served only the more to inflame the Confederate soldiers, who, within half cannon-shot, formed into battalions; all their Generals took their posts, their cannon began to fire, and all the instruments of war to sound. They left a proper distance betwixt the brigades of their foot, by which they might march their horse in case of need, which precaution was of great use to them afterwards. Upon notice, that all was in order, the whole army moved in a moment. The infantry marched up with their muskets on their shoulders to the foot of the intrenchment. Then the great fire of the muskets began; and, as, by the unequal situation of the ground, the Confederate left wing sustained alone for some time the efforts of the enemy, that stopped them a little, but without making them give ground. At the same time Prince Eugene came up, drew his sword, and putting himself at the head of the battalions on the left, broke into the enemy's intrenchments in an instant. The Duke of Savoy did the like in the centre, and the right near Lusingo. In conclusion, the 1706. Confederates triumphed on all sides, and their horse advancing through the intervals left for them, it was no longer a fight, but a pursuit. By noon the victory was complete, and the City intirely deivered, for the enemy abandoned the attack, and the remains of their army retired to the other side of the Po. The rest of the day was spent in taking several Casines and redoubts possessed by the enemy, who all yielded themselves prisoners; and the Duke of Savoy triumphantly entered his capital that evening.

The Duke of Orleans, though he lost the day, yet gave great demonstrations of courage, and received several wounds. Marshal Marsin fell into the enemy's hands, but died of his wounds in a few hours. Upon him the errors of this dreadful day were cast; the Duke of Orleans, with most of the chief Officers, having declared for marching out of their trenches; but the Marshal was of another mind, and, when he found it hard to maintain his opinion, produced positive orders, for it, which put an end to the debate. But the greatest part of the censure fell on Monsieur Cbamillard, who was then in the supreme degree of favour at Court, and was intirely possessed of Madam de Maintenon's confidence. The Duke of la Feuillade had married his daughter; and, in order to the advancing him, he had the command of this siege given him, which was thus obstinately pursued, till it ended in this fatal manner. The oblinacy continued; for the French King sent orders, for a month together, to the Duke of Orleans, to march back into Piedmont, when it was absolutely impossible; and the reason of this was understood afterwards. Madam de Maintenon (it seems) took that care of the King's health and humour, that she did not suffer the ill state of his affairs to be fully told him. He, all that while, was made to believe, that the siege was only raised upon the advance of Prince Eugene's army, and knew not, that his own was defeated and ruined (1)

While this was done at Turin, the Prince of Hesse

(1) The loss of the enemy amounted to four thousand seven hundred and six killed in battle, besides those slain in their retreat, and by the Vaudait. Count Marce, Lieutenant-General; Monsieur la Bretonniere, General of the horse; Messieurs de Senneterre and Villars (Marshals de Camp) the Marquis de Bonneval, Brigadier, taken by his own brother, who left the French service, with the Marquis de Longallerie, were made prisoners; as were likewise eight Colonels, twelve Lieutenant-Colonels, six Majors, ninety-eight Captains, a hundred and eleven Lieutenants, thirty-four Cornets and Ensigns, thirty Engineers and Commissaries of the Artillery, and seven thousand six hundred and forty private men, including those taken in Chivaz; the whole amounting to twelve thousand six hundred and seventy men. In the enemy's works the Germans found two hundred and fifty-five pieces of cannon, a hundred and eight mortars, seven thousand eight hundred bombs, thirty-two thousand Royal grenades, forty-eight thousand cannon-balls, besides a prodigious number in the ditches, &c. four thousand chests of musket-shot, and eighty-six thousand barrels of gun-powder. They took all their tents and baggage, five thousand horses, mules, and oxen, twenty-seven large boats loaded with ammunition, all their pontoons, four pictures of the French King set with diamonds, valued at four thousand pistoles. And Monsieur de Carrege, Commissary General of the army, was taken, with all his mules so richly laden, that that part of the booty alone was valued at three millions of livres; to which must be added ten thousand horses of thirteen regiments of dragoons, which served for a very seasonable recruit to remount the Confederate cavalry, but was such a loss to the enemy, as could neither soon nor easily be retrieved.

Count Daurin, General of the artillery, had defended the City of Turin with all imaginable conduct and bravery; but the garrison suffered very considerably in the siege, which lasted near four months; during which time, the enemy made such a terrible fire upon them, as can scarce be paralleled in any age. Out of the Imperialists in garrison, during the siege, three hundred and eleven were killed, five hundred and eighty-nine wounded, and a hundred and twenty-two taken prisoners; in all one thousand and twenty-six. Out of the troops of Savoy thirteen hundred and three were killed, seventeen hundred and twenty-two wounded, nineteen hundred and fifty-eight deserters; the whole five thousand and ninety-three. Out of the dismounted horse a hundred and forty-one killed, and a hundred and fifty-four wounded. Out of the men belonging to the artillery there were seventy-one killed, seventy-five wounded, and forty-seven deserted; the whole loss amounted to six thousand six hundred and seven, besides near three thousand of the Confederates killed or disabled in the battle.

* The

1706. Hesse advanced to the Mincio, which the French abandoned; but, as he went to take Castiglione, Medavi, the French General, surprized him, and cut off about two thousand of his men; upon which he was forced to retire to the Adige. The French magnified this excessively, hoping, with the noise they made about it, to balance their real loss at Turin; and they continued some time about Fenestrelles and Briançon, as if they had a design to return with their army into Piedmont, and, to give an air of truth to their pretences, made some preparations and unsuccessful attempts to pass through the valley of Aosta. But the Duke of Savoy and Prince Eugene, disregarding the reports spread by the French, were only intent upon improving their late advantages and present opportunities. All the places, possessed by the enemy in Piedmont, Monferrat, the Milanese, and the neighbouring Provinces, were reduced one after another, some voluntarily, as Milan; others by force, and among the rest Pavia, Mortara, Alexandria, Pizzighitona, Tortona (the garrison of which was put to the sword) and Casal, the garrison of which was made prisoners of war, as well as those of many others; so that, except Cremona, Valenza, and the castle of Milan, which were blocked up, France lost at the conclusion of the campaign a vast country, the invading and keeping of which had cost prodigious sums of money, by a revolution no less surprising than that, which happened in the beginning of the campaign in the Netherlands.

Designs for a descent in France.
Burnet.
M. S. *

An account of the Marquis of Guiscard.

There was another alarm given the French this summer, which heightened the disorder they were in after the battle of Ramillies. The Queen and the States made great preparations for a descent in France, which was projected by the Abbot de la Bourlie, brother to the Count de Guiscard, Lieutenant-General in the army of France, and Governor of Namur when taken by King William. This Abbot, upon a family disgust, having thrown up his Abby, formed the airy design of restoring the civil and religious liberties of France, which the low condition of that Kingdom, the general discontent of the people, and the united power of the Allies seemed to encourage. In pursuance of his design, the Abbot repaired to the Southern Provinces of France, where he settled a correspondence with several persons of note, especially among the Camisars, who had then taken up arms.

From thence he went to Turin, where he assumed the title of Marquis de Guiscard. He was well received by the Duke of Savoy, who honoured him with the rank of a general Officer in his army, and gave him a recommendatory letter to the Emperor. Pleased with this success he hastened to Vienna, and applying himself to Prince Eugene (with whom he had been intimate in his youth) was by the Prince's means made a Lieutenant-General in the Emperor's army, which served to give him credit and confidence with the maritime powers so absolutely necessary to his projects.

From Vienna the Marquis came to the Hague, where he prevailed with Pensionary Heinsius to hearken to his proposals, and to give him such credentials, as gained him an easy admission to the Duke of Marborough, when he came over in the winter 1705-6. Whilst in Holland, the Marquis published (as he had done at Turin) letters of exhortation to his countrymen, which he found means to disperse over France by way of manifestos. These were all penned in the style of Enthusiasm, of which he seemed to have a great tincture.

Thus supported and recommended he came into England, where he was favourably received, and grew into the good opinion and intimacy of Mr. Henry St. John, Secretary of war (which continued till within a short time of his death) and of other eminent persons. Never was an affair of such importance concerted and settled in so small a time. Guiscard was made Lieutenant-General, and had the command of a regiment of dragoons, consisting of twelve troops, with the direction of six regiments of foot, all formed out of the French Refugees on the Hijf establishment, at least as to the Officers. The Marquis, on account of his Religion, bore only the name of Lieutenant-Colonel. To these regiments were added as many English foot and dragoons, as amounted in the whole to ten thousand foot and one thousand two hundred horse. A report of Guiscard's commanding in chief caused two Refugee General Officers to desire to be excused serving in the expedition. But this report was without any ground, for the command of the land-forces was conferred on Earl Rivers, and of the fleet on Sir Cloudesley Shovel. It was the 30th of July before the forces and a large train of artillery, under the command of Colonel Richards, were all embarked. Earl Rivers went on board the Barfleur that day, and fell down with the fleet to St. Helen's to wait the coming of the Dutch, who were detained in the Downs by contrary winds, and did not join the fleet till the 13th of August near Plymouth. Next day the whole fleet, consisting of one hundred and fifty sail, was forced into Torbay, where a Council of war was held on board the Admiral. At this Council Guiscard, who, the moment the fleet put to sea, had been acknowledged Lieutenant-General, had the mortification to see the project he had been so long contriving entirely demolished. Earl Rivers, who had opened his orders the day before he got into Torbay, found himself authorised to examine Guiscard very strictly concerning the descent, and, to the great surprize of the board, he had nothing but probabilities and a few correspondents to go upon, and therefore the Council came to some resolutions very disadvantageous to Guiscard, which were immediately sent up to Court by an express. The Politicians were at a loss, nor is it known to this day what could induce England and Holland to make such an armament upon so weak a foundation. Indeed, if a diversion was only aimed at by alarming the coasts of France, the design was in great measure answered. For the alarm was general. It put all the maritime Counties of France to a vast was on the spot. It will be marked in the margin by the letters M. S.

* The account of this descent, and the campaigns in Spain from 1706 to 1712, are chiefly taken from a manuscript narrative, by a Chaplain in the army, who No. 49. Vol. III.

1706. vast charge, and under dismal apprehensions. Officers were sent from the Court to exercise them, but they saw what their militia was, and that was all their defence (1).

About the same time that the express came from the fleet, another arrived from the Lord Galway, after his retreat from Madrid into Valencia, to solicit for succours, and the Court was not long in suspending what to order. Instead of carrying on the alarm to France, the reduction of Spain was thought of much greater consequence, and therefore new orders were sent to the fleet to sail first to Lisbon, and there to take such measures, as the state of affairs in Spain should require. At the same time, Guiscard was sent back to London, as were the Officers of three of the French regiments of foot, the soldiers being left to complete the rest; and Rear-Admiral Dilks was ordered to Portsmouth, with six of the largest men of war. In their short voyage they met with such a violent storm, that they were all six in danger of being lost, two of them being forced through the Needles, a thing unheard of, and very hazardous, for first rate ships.

The fleet, after having been detained near seven weeks in Torbay, by contrary and stormy winds, sailed at last the 1st of October, and arrived in three weeks at Lisbon. Earl Rivers went, November 3, to wait on the King at a little house at Alcantara, which, it was said, he hired for his health, but, more probably, to be near a Convent of Nuns, which was over-against this little house, where a beautiful English Lady, sister to a considerable Merchant, was shut up by her husband, a Portuguese of a great estate, upon the account of an intrigue with the King. In this house the King lived very privately, four or five straggling soldiers being about the gate in different coloured cloaths, without any regular entry without or within, nor any other appearance of a King than a canopy he stood under, with only four persons with him very indistinctly 1706. rrently dressed, when he gave audience to the General. He received the Earl with his hat off, and with great civility, saying, he was glad to see him, and approved much of his going to join the King of Spain. In this he was not thought sincere, for he would fain have kept the army in Portugal. He spoke always to strangers by an interpreter, for the palate of his mouth was so much damaged, that even the Portuguese, that were not admitted to a great familiarity, could not understand him without great difficulty (2).

In less than a month after the audience, the King died on the 28th of November. When he was opened, his body was found to be intirely decayed within. During his three days illness, all the wonder-working relics of Lisbon were carried to him, and continual procession made in the City for his recovery, but all to no purpose. The very day after his decease, the young King, his eldest son, who was then eighteen years old, took the Administration into his hands, and signed a treaty of Alliance, expressing great heartiness in it.

About the middle of December, the Secretary of State desired a Conference with Earl Rivers, in which he pressed him very much from the King, to stay in Portugal with the army under his command, but his solicitations proved fruitless: For the Earl ordered, two days after, the horses to be embarked, which were almost all on board, when an express arrived from England, with orders to stay in Portugal, which put a stop to the embarkation. Ten days after, Earl Rivers had an audience of the King, and laid before him several demands in writing, particularly about furnishing mules for drawing the artillery, and for the Officers baggage, as it was practised in Spain. The answer was to be returned in three days, and to determine the Earl's staying or going. But when it came, orders were immediately given to embark the remainder of the horses. The General and all the Officers went on

Dec. 21.

(1) The manuscript narrative says, the Duke of Raguclaire had an army of no less than forty thousand men to defend Guinea, and would have been ready to receive us, if we had gone to the intended place. These troops, he observes, would have been of great service to the French in Flanders. Burnet says, he saw one of the manifestos that Earl Rivers was ordered to publish upon his landing: He declared, that he was come neither to pillage the country, nor to conquer any part of it: He came only to restore the people to their liberties, and to have assemblies of the States, as they had anciently, and to restore the Edicts to the Protestants, promising protection to all that should come and join him.

(2) November 12, Earl Rivers and the Admiral, attended by several Officers, were to wait on the young Princes, the King's sons, at the Royal palace, and were received in the most uncivil formal manner, ever I saw, or heard of: After waiting about six minutes, we were conducted through three rooms to a fourth, where, on a Turkey carpet, and under a canopy, were the four young Princes drawn up in exact rank; the eldest on the right, and next to him, according to their ages. As soon as within the room we all bowed very low: Then, going near them, the Earl Rivers bowed again low; first to the eldest, then to each particularly: All our Officers doing the same. But they stood stiff like statues, with their hats on, not shewing the least notice or civility either with their bodies or hands. The Earl Rivers spoke twice to the Secretary of State, who was near him, to interpret something to the eldest Prince, who made answers by the Secretary, and then waved his hand for us to go: So we all bowed low, then went backwards, with our faces to them till near the door, then bowed again, and so went out, without the least notice, or return of civility: Which was a most offensive and odious piece of State. The three eldest were in black, with large bands, and large Holland ruffles, and black clokes. Their right hands in, or near the coat-pocket; and left hands in their breast: Full bottom'd perukes hanging before, of an awkward length, shorter by much than those worn at our Court: Their hats looped up very low, so that both hat and peruke looked ungenteel. The youngest was in a purple coat fashionably made, with a cravat tucked as ours, and looked very well. The eldest is eighteen years of age; their persons are indifferently good, except the second son, who has an ill-favoured swollen face; he is the tallest: The others promise to be but of a little stature. Their Court was thin, and almost half of Priests of several orders, some in comical dresses. In the room with the Princes, except the Secretary of State, the company stood up against the walls, as immoveable as the Princes: No guard, armed men, or centry without, or within the palace; in the first hall below stairs, about eight halbarbs were set up against the wall near the door, that leads to the great stair case.

1706. on board; and, on the 2d of January, the fleet failed for Alicant, where they arrived on the 28th of the same month.

At Alicant, Earl Rivers found an Aid de-Camp from the Lord Galway, waiting for his arrival with a letter, to desire that he would assist at a General Council of war, which was to be held in the City of Valencia. Accordingly, about the middle of February, the Earls Rivers and of Essex went to Valencia, where the Grand Council was held to determine the operations of the campaign; the result of which was, that they should act offensively, seek out the enemy, and endeavour to bring them to a battle, considering the great reinforcement sent from England. Here no less than four English Generals met together; the Earls of Peterborough, Galway, and Rivers, and General Stanhope, the Queen's Envoy Extraordinary to the King of Spain. The Earl of Peterborough was recalled, so the command of the forces was to remain either with Lord Galway or Lord Rivers. The Earl of Galway used many arguments to persuade Earl Rivers to take it upon him, notwithstanding the orders he had received from England to stay and command. But Earl Rivers, not liking the country, or for some other reason, chose to return to England, which he and the Earl of Essex did a few days after, and Sir Cloudesley Shovel sailed back with the fleet to Lisbon.

In the end of the campaign, in which Poland had been harrassed with the continuance of the war, but without any great action; the King of Sweden seeing, that King Augustus supported his affairs in Poland, by the supplies both of men and money, that he drew from his Electorate, resolved to stop that resource. He marched therefore in the beginning of September through Lusatia into Saxony, and quickly made himself master of an open country, that was under no apprehensions of such an invasion, nor in any fort prepared for it, and had few strong places in it capable of making resistance. The rich town of Leipsick, and all the rest of the country, was without any opposition put under contribution. All the Empire was alarmed at this; and it was first apprehended, that it was owing to French counsels, in order to raise a new war in Germany, and put the North all in a flame. Robinson and Haerflet, Envoys from England and Holland, were ordered to attend the King of Sweden, and desire him to declare his true intentions. The King gave it out, that he had no design to give any disturbance to the Empire, and intended by this march only to bring the war of Poland to a speedy conclusion. Accordingly King Augustus, seeing his hereditary dominions in the hands of his enemy, soon found he could no longer maintain the war in Poland, and therefore a treaty was set on foot with such secrecy, that it was concluded before it was thought to be in agitation. Augustus was only waiting for a fit opportunity to disengage himself from his Polanders and from the Muscovites; but an incident happened, that had almost imbroiled all again. For, before the ratifications of the treaty were exchanged, the armies being near one another in Great Poland at Kalish, the Polanders and Muscovites attacked the Suedes at a great disadvantage, being much superior in number, and almost cut them in pieces. King Augustus had no share in this, and did all he durst to avoid it. He made all the haste he could out of Poland, and, immediately after the battle, the peace, to the great surprize of all Europe, was published, having been signed, the 24th of September, above a month before the engagement. By the treaty King Augustus resigned the Kingdom of Poland, and the Great Dukedom of Lithuania, and acknowledged Stanislaus as true, rightful King of Poland. He was contented with the empty name of King, though that seemed rather to be a reproach than any accession of honour to his Electoral dignity; but he thought otherwise, and stipulated, that it should be continued to him: He was at mercy, for he had neither forces nor treasure. It was thought the King of Sweden treated him with too much rigour, when he had so intirely mastered him; but he was as little pitied as he deserved to be, for, by many wrong practices, he had drawn all his misfortunes upon himself. The King of Sweden, being thus in the heart of Germany in so formidable a posture, gave great apprehensions to the Allies. The French made strong applications to him, but the Courts of Prussia and Hanover were in such a concert with that King, that they gave the rest of the Allies great assurances, that he would do nothing to disturb the peace of the Empire, nor to weaken the Alliance. The Court of France pressed him to offer his mediation for a general peace; all the answer he gave was, that, if the Allies made the like application to him, he would interpose and do all good offices in a treaty, but refused to enter into any separate measures with France.

This was not the only application the French King made for a treaty. Soon after the battle of Ramillies, the Elector of Bavaria gave out hopes of peace. He writ a letter from Mons, the 21st of October, N. S. to the Duke of Marlborough, and another of the same date to the Deputies of the States, with proposals from the Court of France for holding of Conferences in some place between the two camps, or between Mons and Brussels, to treat of a peace. The Deputies of the States had sent the Elector's letter to the Hague, and the Duke had also communicated his to the Queen his Mistress. When the army separated in the Netherlands, and the winter-quarters were settled, the Duke came to the Hague, the 9th of November, N. S. The next day the Deputies of the States came and held a long Conference with him, chiefly upon the subject of the Elector's letters. It was agreed, that the steps, which France had made towards a peace, should be communicated to the Ministers of the Allies, in order to remove all suspicions of clandestine negotiations, and encourage the several members of the Grand Alliance to redouble their efforts against the next campaign. This being concerted, as well as the draughts of the respective answers to the Elector of Bavaria, the States desired the Ministers of the Allies, residing at the Hague, to be present, on the 21st of November, at an extraordinary Congress, when the Deputies for foreign affairs made the following notification to them. They owned, "That France had formerly, by some private persons, made general intimations of their willingness to treat of peace, and that, last winter, the Marquis d'Alegre had presented the States a formal memorial on the same subject [the substance of which was read in the Congress] but they had given no

1706. "ear to those advances, nor communicated them to the Allies, because they did not judge them worth imparting to them. But that, in October last, the Elector of Bavaria had writ a letter to the Duke of Marlborough, and another to the Field-deputies of the States, which letters, with the draughts of the answers, were also communicated to the Congresses (1)."

Then the Deputies of the States declared to the Assembly, "That their High-Mightinesses were resolved not to enter into any negotiation of peace, but jointly with their Allies, and faithfully to communicate to them the proposals, that might be made to them, expecting that the Allies would do no less on their part."

The Duke of Marlborough and the Pensionary spoke very prudently on this occasion in the Congresses, and both concluded for the continuation of the war. The Ministers were likewise desired to write to their respective Courts to exhort them to follow the example of England and Holland, who were resolved to make a vigorous campaign. The Assembly was extremely pleased with the sincerity and fairness wherewith this communication was made.

The States and the Duke had several weighty reasons for the communicating these proceedings to the Ministers of the Allies, some of whom were very uneasy on the apprehension, that some secret negotiation was transacting without their knowledge. Besides, it was spread about in Holland by the emissaries of France, that the Duke of Marlborough, finding his account in continuing the war, would induce the Queen of Great-Britain to refuse to hearken to a reasonable peace. The same thing had been insinuated in England, and therefore it was proper to demonstrate the contrary, and to shew, that the refusing to enter into Conferences with France was owing to a belief, that a solid and lasting peace could not be expected from thence.

However the Court of France did not stop here, but, finding they could not prevail with the King of Sweden, they made a public application to the Pope for his mediating a peace. The sum of their offers, for that purpose, was to give up to King Charles either Spain and the West-Indies, or Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with a barrier for the Dutch, and a compensation to the Duke of Savoy for the waste made in his Country. But these offers were rejected (2). The Court of Vienna was so alarmed at the insinuations

(1) The Elector's letter to the Duke of Marlborough was as follows:

"The most Christian King, Sir, finding, that some overtures of peace, which he had caused to be made in a private manner, instead of producing the effect of making known his dispositions towards procuring a general peace, have been looked upon, by ill-designing persons, as an artifice to disunite the Allies, and make an advantage of the misunderstanding, that might be created among them; has resolved to shew the sincerity of his intentions, by renouncing all secret negotiations, and openly proposing Conferences, in which, means may be found for the re-establishing the tranquillity of Europe."

"The most Christian King is pleased to charge me to inform you of this, and to desire you to acquaint the Queen of England with it."

"I give the like notification on the part of the most Christian King to the States-General, by a letter, that I have written to the Field-deputies; and he would do the like with regard to the other Potentates, that are at war with him, had they Ministers near at hand, as you are, to receive the like intimation, he having no design to exclude any of the said Potentates from the negotiation, that shall be begun in the Conferences he proposes. Moreover, for advancing a good so great and necessary to Europe, which has too long suffered the inevitable calamities of war, he consents that a place may forthwith be chosen between the two armies; and after their being separated, between Mons and Brussels, in which you, Sir, with whom the interests of England are so safely intrusted, the Deputies, which the States shall please to nominate, and the persons, whom the King of France shall impower, may begin to treat upon so important an affair."

"I am extremely pleased, Sir, to have such an occasion to write you this letter, being persuaded it will leave no room to doubt of the sentiments of his most Christian Majesty, which may be so beneficial to all Europe."

"You will be glad to give an account of it to the Queen of England without loss of time, and to whomsoever else you shall think fit. I shall expect your answer, Sir, to acquaint the most Christian King of it; and shall be always ready, Sir, to do you service."

Mons, Octob. 21, 1706.

M. EMANUEL, Elector.

The Duke of Marlborough's answer was in these terms:

SIR,

"Having communicated to the Queen, my Mistress, what your Electoral Highness did me the honour to write to me in your letter of the 21st of last month, of the intentions of the most Christian King to endeavour to re-establish the tranquillity of Europe, by Conferences to be held for that purpose between Deputies on both sides; her Majesty has commanded me to answer your Electoral Highness, that as she has received with pleasure the notice of the King's inclination to agree to the making of a solid and lasting peace with all the Allies, being the sole end, that obliged her Majesty to continue this war till now; so she will be very glad to conclude it, in concert with all her Allies, on such conditions, as may secure them from all apprehensions of being forced to take up arms again, after a short interval, as has so lately happened. Her Majesty is also willing I should declare, that she is ready to enter, jointly with all the high Allies, into just and necessary measures for attaining such a peace; her Majesty being resolved not to enter upon any negotiation, without the participation of her said Allies. But the way of Conferences, that is proposed, without more particular Declarations on the part of his most Christian Majesty, does not seem to her to be proper for obtaining a truly solid and lasting peace. The States-General are of the same opinion. Wherefore your Electoral Highness will rightly judge, that other more solid means must be thought on to obtain so great an end, to which her Majesty will contribute, with all the sincerity that can be wished, having nothing so much at heart, as the relief of her subjects, and the tranquillity of Europe. Your Electoral Highness will always do me the justice to be persuaded of the respect, with which I have the honour to be, &c."

Hague, Novemb. 20, 1706.

The letters between the Elector and the Field-deputies were of much the same tenor.

(2) Dr. Hare, in his piece, intitled, The management of the war, in a letter to a Tory-Member, takes notice of the objection, which had been urged by the

1706. cinations some had expressed towards the entertaining this project, that this was believed to be the secret motive of the treaty, the succeeding winter, for evacuating the Milanese, and of their obstinately persisting, the summer after, in their designs upon Naples; for by this means they became masters of both.

The Duke of Marlborough having now settled several important affairs with the States, particularly the continuing the Hessian troops in Italy, of Marlborough according to the Duke of Savoy's desire, he embarked for England, and arrived at London the 18th of November, O. S.

As the Duke had by the Emperor been invested

cd

Tories, That a good peace might have been had at the end of the Ramillies campaign. "Now to decide this question, says he, we must first settle what a good peace is; and, in order to that, must consider, what it was we went into the war for. No body wants to be told, that this was chiefly to obtain these two ends, the restitution of the Spanish Monarchy to the House of Austria, and the procuring of a good barrier against France on the side of the Netherlands; without which two points there can be no security for Great-Britain, that their best trade will not be lost, and with it their Religion and Government, and every thing that is dear to them. For we should every minute be in danger of having the bigotry, slavery, and poverty of France forced upon us by the exorbitant power of that most arbitrary Prince, if he should be suffered to strengthen himself with the addition of that vast Monarchy, who was before much too great for his neighbours; to say nothing of the safety of the Dutch, or the liberty of Europe.—Now the Spanish Monarchy, the restitution of which is the first article of the Grand Alliance, is known by every body to consist, besides the Spanish Netherlands, of these two great parts, of Spain and the Indies; and of Milan, Naples, and Sicily, with Sardinia and the adjacent isles. And a good barrier against France means, at least, a better than the Dutch had before; which, by the experience of fifty years, has been found to be much too weak for so large a frontier; the Spanish Flanders, and its capital City, Ghent, having in truth no cover at all, and Brabant but a very poor one; while, the French being intire masters of the Lyx and Scheld, both provinces lie exposed to their invasions. Look but on some large maps of these provinces, such as have been printed of late years, and your eyes will presently convince you of the truth of this. But, if this restitution and this barrier were thought necessary, at our entering into the war, no body, I presume, will say, they are less necessary now, when so much more has been done to gain these ends, than any body at the beginning could ever hope to see. And, if these two points are necessary, then no peace without them can be a good peace. Let us then compare this good peace with what the French offered at the end of the Ramillies campaign—which, in short, was no more than this, to give up to the Allies, which of those two they liked best, either Spain and the Indies, or Milan, Naples, and Sicily, &c. which offer was unanimously rejected. I suppose, there is no need of proving, that the Allies ought not to have accepted either part of this alternative, it being so short of what, upon our entrance into the war, was thought necessary. To have been content with a moiety of what we went into the war for, after so many successes, and not a few surprisingly great, would have rendered us inexcusable to all posterity; and some body, who, we are now told, prolongs the war, would have been said to have been well paid for such a peace. It would have been, in the language of the faction, a plain case, we were sold to France, and nothing less than his head could have atoned for it. But, instead of proving the absurdity of accepting such a peace, I shall shew you rather, what to every body is not so plain; and that is, that the French were not sincere: They meant nothing by their offer, but to amuse the Allies, and knew they could not all agree to accept either part of the alternative; and that England and Holland without the Emperor, could not take Spain and the Indies, were they

No. 49. VOL. III.

"never so much inclined to it. For, had the Allies hearkened to this proposal, it had been in the power of the French to have closed with which they would. Now it is easy to see, what this must have ended in. For in such partition there is no doubt, but, as the Dutch and we should have been for Spain and the Indies, the Emperor would have made the other part his choice, which is evidently left for him. Which part now of the Allies in this division would France be most willing to comply with? Or, in other words, which part of the Monarchy would they choose of the two to quit? A man must be blind not to see, that the part the Emperor would like best to have, the same France would like best to part with. Behold then the necessary consequence of hearkening to such terms: The Confederacy broken, and the maritime powers left to shift for themselves, without being able to obtain either of the parts, when they ought to be content, according to the terms of the Grand Alliance, with nothing less than both. Who now, I would fain know, have most reason to complain, that these offers were rejected, the people of London or Vienna? They, who might have had the part they had most mind to, if they would have abandoned their Allies? Or we, who, it is certain, besides the infamy of so base an action, could have had nothing? Had the Writers, who are so able at making something out of nothing, had their lot in Austrian ground, what a field had there been for them? What rare matter to shew their skill in? What specious pretences, without the help of Secret History, to give out, that the Emperor was ill-advised? What reject so advantageous an offer, by which so great an addition of real strength would have been made to the House of Austria; and that, at a time, when they were so unable to carry on the war, when the people have been exhausted with continual wars for more than thirty years!—Would not this be the language of the faction, if the scene were changed from London to Vienna? And yet we do not hear, that either the Emperor, or his People, have hitherto thought it any crime in the Ministers, who would not hearken to those terms. Instead of that, all the world think it much for their honour, that they have appeared true to themselves, and faithful to their Allies, in rejecting so pitiful and insecure a peace. And is not this a reproach to us, who suffer ourselves to be deluded by such vile impostors, who would persuade us out of our senses, that half the Spanish Monarchy is as good as the whole, and that nothing is as good as half. For I have shewn, that one half only was offered, and that even that could not be had. It must, sure, to all thinking men be very surprising, that we only, of all the Allies, should complain, that this ridiculous offer of the French was rejected, when we, of all of them, have most reason to be pleased with it.—I must beg leave to observe one thing further, which is of too much moment to be past over; and that is, that they, who have done their country so much service in rejecting this offer from the French, would have done it still much greater, could they have prevented any regard being given to it. For, though the refusing these terms could do no harm, the hearkening to them, I will shew you, did a great deal. The inclination some people, of the same complexion with the Author of the Secret History, expressed to come to a treaty with the French upon the terms offered, raised in the Imperial Court a jealousy, that the maritime powers were

9 I

ed with the Principality of Milddenheim, for delivering the Empire from the arms of France; so he was now no less distinguished at home by the Queen and Parliament. For, soon after his return, he received the thanks of both Houses for his eminent services, and the Lords addressed the Queen to settle his honours on his Posterity. This was readily complied with; and an act passed to limit his titles and honours to his eldest daughter, and her male heirs, and then to all his other daughters successively, according to their priority of birth, and that Woodstock-Mannor and Blenheim-House should always go with the titles. And, a few days after, upon the Commons address, the Queen agreed, that the five thousand pounds pension out of the Post-Office

"tampering with France, and making terms for themselves, to which the interest of the House of Austria was to be sacrificed. This put that Court upon measures, that had a fatal influence on the next campaign, and occasioned the two most unfortunate events, that have happened all this war. First, this suspicion made them begin and conclude a treaty with the French for evacuating the Milanese, without the privacy of England and Holland, who did not know one word of the matter. And what do you think was the consequence of this? Why, it gave the French an opportunity of sending immediately into Spain a great body of good Veteran troops. And it is to this reinforcement sent the Duke of Anjou, that we owe the loss of the battle of Almanza, which proved so fatal to our own affairs on that side.—And the same jealousy put the Imperial Court upon taking another step, no less prejudicial to the common cause, and that was the expedition to Naples, which they could not be prevailed with to defer upon the repeated and most pressing instances, that the maritime powers made to them by their Ministers both at Vienna and Italy. And the consequence of the expedition was, that it not only diverted a great part of the troops, that were to execute the project on Toulon, but retarded, for a considerable time, the march of the rest. And this loss of time, and lessening of their numbers, seem to have been the chief occasion of the miscarriage of that glorious enterprize. Nothing made the Imperial Court so obstinately bent on that unhappy expedition, but the fears they had, that Naples, as well as Milan, would at the Hague be given up to facilitate a peace, which they were resolved to prevent, by getting possession as soon as they could. This is all we have got by hearkening to those offers, which it is now thought a great crime we did not close with; the loss of the battle of Almanza, and the miscarriage of the project on Toulon, the greatest, most important, best concerted enterprize, that was ever entered on. And both these misfortunes had, in all probability, been prevented, had the offers of the French been roundly rejected at the first, and no occasion of jealousy had, by listening to them, been given the Imperial Court.—After saying so much of that part of the offer the French made, which concerns the partition they proposed of the Spanish Monarchy, which we ought not to have accepted, if we could, and could not, if we would; there is no need of telling you, what barrier was offered for the Netherlands, which the Dutch were most concerned in, who do not use to neglect good offers to come at a peace, if we may believe the faction, who have for a long time pretended to fear nothing so much as their quitting the Alliance for their own separate interest. Tho' now the noble firmness they have shewn in adhering to it, till terms may be had to the satisfaction of all parties, is by these ill designing Politicians, who can take every thing by a wrong handle, imputed to them for a crime.—That this is the whole truth of this matter; that these, and no other, were the offers the French made after the Ramillies campaign; I will give you, besides these already hinted, one plain authentic proof, which is as good as a thousand demonstrations; and that is a letter of the French King to the Pope on this subject, writ in the following spring, when all thoughts of peace were at an end, and a new campaign was entering upon."

This letter was dated at Versailles, February 17. 1707, and was as follows:

"The care, which your Holiness continues to take for procuring the peace of Europe, is always equally agreeable to us. We have nothing more at heart than to second your endeavours; and we would even prevent you in any thing we could do to make them effectual. As it was not our fault, that the war was begun, so we shall seek occasions to end it, by the most ready and easy methods. Your Holiness has been informed, that we have already made frequent advances to come to what some call an end. It can be attributed only to the misfortune of the times, that Catholic Princes, struck with fear of displeasing the Allies, should yet refuse to hear the holy exhortations of the Vicar of Jesus Christ. When we left it to the arbitration of your Holiness to satisfy the rights and demands of the Emperor, by a valuable compensation upon some parts of the Spanish Monarchy; the Ministry of your Holiness were charged with the care of making the proposal of it to that Prince. But with what harshness did he reject it! Having said things exorbitant, and insolently demanded, that our Grandson should be recalled. Who could have thought, most holy Father, that he would have made so arrogant a return to an insulted King, to a Minister of your Holiness, and to our love of peace? For the conjuncture, far from being favourable to the House of Austria, seemed then to threaten it by the superiority of our forces, and by our gaining the battle of Cassano. But God, who is the Master of events, changed the posture of our affairs. Yet, though we were employed with the cares of repairing our losses, we had still in our minds the idea we had conceived of peace, at the time even of our greatest prosperity. We renewed to Holland the offer of a barrier for their State, and of the security demanded for their trade; reserving it still to ourselves to treat with the Emperor about a compensation. Propositions so reasonable were again rejected by the intrigues of that party, which had shewed itself averse to the advancement of our Grandson. And then we employed all our thoughts to increase our preparations for a war, which had been violently and unjustly declared against us. Nevertheless, as it becomes us to be obedient to the pious exhortations of your Holiness; and, to the end that our enemies may have no pretence to impute to us the loss of so much Christian blood, as is already spilt, and now going to be let out, we will give your Holiness a plain and frank account of the disposition we are in for peace. We will therefore acquaint your Holiness, that the King, our Grandson, has intrusted us with full power to convey the Archduke a part of those estates, that compose the Spanish Monarchy. The Catholic King has the hearts of the true Spaniards, and is content to reign over them. It only depends therefore on the Emperor to explain himself at this time, who may have, if he pleases, for ever reunited to his family the Milanese, Naples, and Sicily, with the other Islands belonging to Spain, that are situated in the Mediterranean sea.

"We should easily agree about a barrier for the Republic of the United Provinces. And, the two pretences of the war being thus removed, it would not be difficult to put an end to these misfortunes, which Europe has been so long oppressed with.

"We

Burnet.*

The affairs of Scotland were all this while in a very dangerous situation. The interest of the Pretender (it is said *) increased to such a degree, that four parts in five of the Nobility and Gentry, and above half of the Commons over the whole Kingdom, expressed, on all occasions, their inclination and readiness to serve that cause. Accounts of this were from time to time transmitted to the Court of France, who, being much frightened by the successes of the Confederates, seemed more sincere and hearty than formerly, in promoting the interest of the Pretender. Colonel Hookes was sent to Edinburgh in 1705, with letters from the French King and the Pretender to the Duke of Hamilton, and the Earls of Errol, Marischal, and Hume, exhorting them to concert measures for the restoration of the exiled Royal Family; promising to assist the Scots Nation in so good a design, empowering the Colonel to receive proposals, and desiring them to send over to France one fully instructed to treat for that purpose. This Hookes had been a Presbyterian, and one of the Duke of Monmouth's

Chaplains, when he invaded England; but, whether he was taken prisoner and pardoned, or made his escape, it is certain, that, having afterwards turned Roman Catholic, and entered into the French service, he had, by this time, raised himself there to the command of a regiment of foot, and gained such credit at the Court of France, as to be appointed to manage their correspondence with Scotland. In conversation he appeared to be a man of tolerable good sense, and quick parts, but, being withal extremely vain and haughty, and not very circumspect, the Cavaliers and Country-party declined admitting him into their private meetings, to propose, as he designed, their owning the Pretender's interest, and moving his restoration in Parliament. They were cautious of confiding in him, because, in all his proposals, he seemed more intent upon raising a commotion in the Kingdom, and to giving a diversion to the enemies of France, than upon what really tended to advance the Pretender's affairs. However, the Cavaliers, to whom he delivered his letters and messages, told him in general terms, "That they were willing to do every thing, that could in reason be expected from them; and would,"

"We pray God, that he will preserve your Holiness a great many years, in the Government of his Church."

Your devoted Son,

The King of France and Navarre,

LEWIS.

The Author of the Military History of the late Prince Eugene of Savoy, and the late John Duke of Marlborough, Vol. II. p. 18, tells us, "That it is not certain, what were the true reasons, why the Confederates did not listen at this time to the proposals of peace, since there are just reasons to believe, that his most Christian Majesty would have consented to any thing, that could have been demanded, less than an intire renunciation of Spain. Nay, it is to be wondered, that the Alliance itself was not broke at this time, great jealousies arising between the Imperialists and the Dutch, about the conquests in the Netherlands, the jurisdiction being claimed by the former, and exercised very despotically by the latter. The source of this difference lay here: It was stipulated in the Grand Alliance, that the Dutch should first have a barrier, and, when they were safe, the Spanish Provinces were to be delivered up to the Emperor or the King of Spain. The Imperialists were of opinion, that the Dutch were now safe; and demanded therefore, that the Province of Limburgh, which had been reduced the last campaign, should be delivered up: To which the States returned general answers, and continued to exercise their jurisdiction as formerly. Count Zinzendorf was pitched on therefore by his Imperial Majesty, to go first to the camp, and then to the Hague, in order to regulate all things with the Allies. The Duke of Marlborough entertained this Ministry very agreeably; they conversed together on the subject of the overtures made for peace, and canvassed the several neutral powers of Europe, in order to find out the proper mediation, under the auspice of which a negotiation might be commenced. The Pope was by no means grateful to the Protestant powers, nor a grain more in the good graces of his Imperial Majesty. The Venetians expressed no great inclination to concern themselves in such a business; and it was thought the Emperor would not accept "the mediation of the Swiss Cantons. In the North, the King of Denmark might have been inclined to take on him such a part; but, in regard, that he himself had some differences to adjust, it was doubted, whether a negotiation could be properly carried on through his mediation. Besides, the only plan, that was talked of on the side of the Confederates, was the absolute cession of Spain, and its dependencies, to the House of Austria, and the erecting the Dutchy and County of Burgundy into a Kingdom, which was to be given to King Philip. The Dutch in general were very much disposed to a peace; but the Duke of Marlborough and the Imperial Minister were for continuing the war, that France might be obliged to accept such terms, as would leave it no longer in her power to terrify her neighbours. The answer the Duke of Marlborough gave to the Elector of Bavaria was concerted with, and approved by the Imperial Minister. And thus all the intrigues of France, for bringing on a negotiation somewhere, were absolutely defeated, though she spared no pains to bring them to bear. His most Christian Majesty, however, did not fail to make the most he could of a very indifferent game. He applied himself assiduously to the re-establishment of his troops, and to the raising money by every method he could take; at the same time that his emissaries gave out every where, that the present war was a war merely of interest. That his Imperial Majesty carried it on, because he had all things to hope from it, and nothing either to fear or pay: That the leading people in Great-Britain were such, as gained titles and estates by the war: And that, in Holland, the Pensionary Heinsius, who did all things, was intirely directed by the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene. If these suggestions were neither agreeable to truth nor to the sentiments of the people, at the time they were thrown out, yet, by being often repeated, they gained credit at last, and occasioned some disturbances in Holland, and greater in England."

(1) Six days after his arrival, the Duke coming to the House of Peers, the Lord-Keeper, by direction, made the following speech to him:

My Lord Duke of Marlborough,

"I am commanded by this House to give you Grace their acknowledgment and thanks for the eminent services you have done, since the last Session

"of

1706. "as they were desired, in a short time, send over one to confer with King James (for so they stiled the Pretender) and the King of France." With this answer Hooker returned to France; and the Cavaliers, having resolved to send one over, to see what assistance they could depend upon from thence, unanimously made choice of Captain Henry Stratton, who embarked for France, the very next day after Lockhart returned to Edinburgh, having waited for him, to get a full account of what passed at London, in relation to the intended Union. Besides what concerned that treaty, Lockhart was employed to sift the Tories in England, and endeavour to know what they would do, in case the Pretender came over, and the Scots declared for him; and, having accordingly found means to understand the sentiments of the Duke of Leeds, the Lord Granville, and several others, he informed Captain Stratton, that the English Tories were much more cautious than the Scots Cavaliers; the former being all of opinion, That no attempt ought to be made during the Queen's life. Captain Stratton was kindly received in France, but could bring nothing to a conclusion; the battles of Ramilles and Turin having so disconcerted the French King's measures, that he was not in a condition to spare either men or money for the service of the Pretender. However, the Pretender told Stratton, "That he longed extremely to be amongst his Scots friends;" and obliged him to give him in writing a character of every Member of the Scots Parliament, as they stood affected to him. After this Stratton was dismissed, with fair promises from the French King, of doing all in his power in a more favourable conjuncture, and with letters from the Pretender to the Duke of Hamilton, the Earls of Errol and Marischal, and the Viscount Stor-

mount. The Viscount had two letters inclosed in his, one to the Duke of Atbol, the other to the Marquis of Montrose; the first of which was delivered, and kindly received; but, the Marquis having left the Cavaliers, it was thought to no purpose to make any attempt upon him, and dangerous to trust him with secrets, which he might discover to the Ministers of State; for which reason the Pretender's letter was not delivered to him.

Upon this encouragement from France, the Cavaliers resolved to stand firm, and to exert their utmost efforts in the ensuing Session of Parliament, against the ratification of the treaty of Union; though, about this time, they sustained a great loss in the death of the Earl of Hume, who was more relied on than any other of his party.

Before the Parliament met in Scotland, the Ministry there gave such a fair representation of the Union, that it was generally relished by the people; but no sooner did the articles appear in print, but they were as universally disliked. It was visible, that the Nobility of that Kingdom suffered a great diminution by it; for, though it was agreed, that they should enjoy all the other privileges of the Peers of England, yet the greatest of them all, which was voting in the House of Lords, was refrained to sixteen to be elected by the rest every new Parliament; yet there was a greater majority of the Nobility that concurred in voting for the Union, than in the other States of that Kingdom.

On the 3d of October, the Parliament being met, the Duke of Queenberry, the High-Commissioner, went thither, attended by most of the Nobility, Barons, and other Members; and the Queen's letter was read as follows:

ANNE.

"of Parliament, to her Majesty and your Country, together with their Confederates, in this just and necessary war. Though your former successes against the power of France, while it remained unbroken, gave most reasonable expectation, that you would not fail to improve them; yet what your Grace hath performed, this last campaign, has far exceeded all hopes, even of such as were most affectionate and partial to their Country's interest and your glory. The advantages you have gained against the enemy, are of such a nature, so conspicuous in themselves, so undoubtedly owing to your courage and conduct, so sensibly and universally beneficial in their consequences to the whole Confederacy, that to attempt to adorn them with colouring of words would be vain and inexcusable, and therefore I decline it; the rather, because I should certainly offend that great modesty, which alone can, and does add lustre to your actions, and which, in your Grace's example, has successfully withstood as great trials, as that virtue has met with in any instance whatsoever. And I beg leave to say, that, if any thing could move your Grace to reflect with much satisfaction on your own merit, it would be this: That so August an assembly does, with one voice, praise and thank you; an honour, which a judgment so sure, as that of your Grace's, a judgment rightly of every thing, cannot but prefer to the ostentation of a public triumph."

The Duke's answer to this speech was: "I esteem this as a very particular honour, which your Lordships are pleased to do me. No body in the world can be more sensible of it than I am, nor more desirous to deserve the continuance of your favour and good opinion."

The day before a Committee, appointed by the Commons, having attended the Duke with the thanks of that House for his eminent services to her Majesty and this Kingdom in the last campaign, the Duke told them, "If any thing could add to my satisfaction in the services I have endeavoured to do the Queen and my Country, it would be the particular notice, which the House of Commons is pleased to take of them so much to my advantage." A little after the Lords waited on the Queen with an address, importing, "That having considered the many great actions, which the Duke of Marlborough had performed in her Majesty's service, such actions, as the wisest and greatest of people had rewarded with statues and triumphs; they were extremely desirous to express the just sense they had of his merit, in a peculiar and distinguishing manner; and, in order to perpetuate the memory thereof, to settle and continue his titles and honours, with his right of precedence, in his posterity by act of Parliament. But, having a just regard for the prerogative of the Crown, they thought it their duty, in the first place, to have recourse to her Majesty for her Royal allowance, before any order given for bringing in a bill of such a nature; and to desire her Majesty to let the House know in what manner it would be most acceptable to her, that these titles and honours should be limited." Her Majesty's answer to this address was as follows:

ANNE R.

"Nothing can be more acceptable to me than your address. I am intirely satisfied with the services of the Duke of Marlborough, and therefore cannot but be pleased you have so just a sense of them.

"I must

ANNE R.

My Lords and Gentlemen,The Queen's letter.

"SINCE your last meeting, we did nominate Commissioners to treat of an Union between our two Kingdoms of Scotland and England, and by their great care and diligence a treaty is happily concluded and laid before us.

"We have called you together as soon as our affairs could permit, that the treaty may be under your consideration, in pursuance of the act made in the last Session of our Parliament there; and we hope the terms will be acceptable to you.

"The Union has been long desired by both Nations, and we shall esteem it as the greatest glory of our Reign to have it now perfected, being fully persuaded, that it must prove the greatest happiness of our people.

"An entire and perfect Union will be the solid foundation of a lasting peace: It will secure your Religion, Liberty, and Property; remove the animosities among yourselves, and the jealousies and differences betwixt our two Kingdoms. It must increase your strength, riches, and trade: And by this Union, the whole Island being joined in affection, and free from all apprehension of different interests, will be enabled to resist all its enemies, support the Protestant interest every where, and maintain the liberties of Europe.

"We do, upon this occasion, renew the assurances we have formerly given you, of our resolution to maintain the Government of the Church as by law established in Scotland; and the acts of both Parliaments, upon which this treaty proceeded, having reserved their "respective Governments of the Church in each Kingdom, the Commissioners have left that matter intire; and you have now an opportunity for doing what may be necessary for the security of your present Church Government, after the Union, within the limits of Scotland. The support of our Government and your own safety does require, that you do make necessary provision for maintaining the forces, ships and garrisons, until the Parliament of Great-Britain shall provide for these ends in the united Kingdom.

"We have made choice of our right trusty and right intirely beloved Cousin and Counsellor, James Duke of Queensberry, to be our Commissioner, and represent our Royal person; being well satisfied with his fitness for that trust, from the experience we have of his capacity, zeal, and fidelity to our service, and the good of his Country; which, as it has determined us in the choice, we doubt not but will make him acceptable to you.

"We have fully instructed him in all things we think may fall under your consideration, and seem to be necessary at present: Therefore we desire that you may give trust and credit to him.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It cannot but be an encouragement to you to finish the Union at this time, that God Almighty has blessed our arms, and those of our Allies, with so great success; which gives us the nearer prospect of a happy peace, and with it you will have the full possession of all the advantages of this Union: And you have no reason to doubt, but the Parliament of England will do what is necessary on their part, after the readiness they have shewn to remove

"I must not omit to take notice, that the respectful manner of your proceeding, in desiring my allowance for bringing in the bill, and my direction for the limitation of the honours, does give me great satisfaction.

"My intention is, that, after the determination of the estate, which the Duke of Marlborough now has in his titles and honours, the same should be limited to his eldest daughter, and the heirs male of her body, and then to all his other daughters, successively, according to their priority of birth, and the heirs male of their respective bodies, and afterwards in such manner, as may effectually answer my design and yours, in perpetuating the memory of his merit, by continuing, as far as may be done, his titles and name to all his posterity.

"I think it would be proper, that the honour and manor of Woodstock, and the house of Blenheim, should always go along with the titles; and therefore I recommend that matter to your consideration."

Then the Duke of Marlborough, on this occasion, spoke to the Lords in these words:

My Lords,

"I cannot find words sufficient to express the sense I have of the great and distinguishing honour, which the House has been pleased to do me in their resolution, and their application to her Majesty. The thoughts of it will be a continual satisfaction to me, and the highest encouragement; and the thankful memory of it must last as long as any posterity of mine.

No. 49. Vol. III.

"I beg leave to say a word to the House in relation to that part of her Majesty's most gracious answer, which concerns the estate of Woodstock, and the house of Blenheim. I did make my humble request to the Queen, that those might go along with the titles; and I make the like request to your Lordships, that after the Dutches of Marlborough's death (upon whom they are settled in jointure) that estate and house may be limited to go always along with the honours."

The Lords readily complied with the Queen's and the Duke's desires, and the bill, which was brought in for that purpose, had a quick passage through both Houses.

On the 7th of January, the Commons also having taken into consideration "the eminent services of the Duke of Marlborough, whereby the glory of her Majesty's Government, the honour and safety of the Kingdom, and the interest of the Common Cause had been so highly advanced," they agreed upon an address to the Queen, wherein they humbly desired, "That as her Majesty was, at her expence, graciously pleased to erect the house of Blenheim as a monument of his glorious actions; and the House of Peers, by her Majesty's permission, had given rise to a law for continuing his honours to his posterity; the most obedient Commons might be permitted to express their sense of distinguishing a merit, and their ready disposition to enable her Majesty to make some provision for the more honourable support of his dignity in his posterity, in such manner, as should be most agreeable to her Majesty." Concluding, "That thus the gratitude of the whole Kingdom

1706. "remove what might obstruct the entering on the treaty. We most earnestly recommend to you calmness and unanimity in this great and weighty affair, that the Union may be brought to a happy conclusion, being the only effectual way to secure your present and future happiness, and to disappoint the designs of our and your enemies, who will, doubtless, on this occasion, use their utmost endeavours to prevent or delay this Union, which must so much contribute to our glory, and the happiness of our people. And so we bid you heartily farewell."

Given at our Court at Windor-Castle, the 31st day of July 1706, and of our Reign the 5th year.

By her Majesty's Command,

MAR.

This letter was enforced by the speeches of the Duke of Queenberry, and the Lord-Chancellor Seafeld, after which the treaty of Union was read, and ordered to be printed, together with the proceedings of the Lords Commissioners of both Kingdoms in relation to that matter; and then the Parliament was adjourned to that day fortnight.

A Power ful speech against the Union.

Her Majesty's Ministers were not insensible of the difficulties, which they had to encounter in the affair of the Union, against which, the Dukes of Hamilton and Arbuthnot, the Marquiss of Annandale, the Earls of Errol, Marschal, and Buchan, the Lord Belhaven, Mr. Fletcher of Salton, and some others, had formed a powerful party. The Commissioners from the Shires and Boroughs were almost equally divided, though, it was evident, they were to be the chief gainers by it. Among these the Union was agreed to by a very small majority. It was the Nobility, that in every vote turned the scale for the Union: They were severely reflected upon by those who opposed it; and it was said, many of them were bought off, to sell their country and their birth-right. All those, who adhered inflexibly to the Jacobite interest, opposed every step that was made with great vehemence, for they saw that the Union struck at the root of all their designs for a new Revolution. Yet all these could not have raised or maintained so great an opposition as was made, if they had not prepossessed with fears and jealousies the minds of many among the Presbyterian Clergy, who had the greatest ascendant over the generality of the Laity in Scotland. Among other indications of this temper of the Scots Ministers at this critical juncture, it was taken notice, that, some days before the meeting of the Parliament, one of Duke Hamilton's Chaplains proposed in the General Assembly of the Clergy, "That, before an affair of so great importance, as the Union was, came to be debated before the Estates of the Kingdom, they ought to enter into an Association for the preservation of the Presbyterian discipline, if the treaty concluded by the Commissioners of both Kingdoms was ratified by the respective Parliaments." Another Minister moved, "That a day of fasting and humiliation should be appointed to seek the Lord for counsel in this arduous affair and time of danger." But these two motions were rejected by the majority of voices. These jealousies of the Presbyterians, lest their Church should suffer a change, and be swallowed up by the Church of England, were infused into them chiefly by the old Dutchess of Hamilton, who had great credit with them: And it was suggested, that she and her son had particular views, as hoping, that, if Scotland should continue a separated Kingdom, the Crown might come into their family, they being the next in blood after King James's posterity. The infusion of such apprehensions had a great effect on the main body of that party, who could scarce be brought to hearken to, but never to accept of, the offers, that were made for securing their Presbyterian Government. On the other hand, a great part of the Gentry of Scotland, who had been often in England, and had observed the protection, which all men had from a House of Commons, and the security, which it procured against partial Judges and a violent Ministry, entered into the Union with great zeal. The opening a free trade, not only with England, but with the Plantations, and the protection of the fleet of England, drew in those, who understood these matters, and saw there was no other way in view, to make the Nation rich and considerable. Those, who had engaged far into the design of Darien, and were great losers by it, saw now an honourable way to be reimbursed; which made them wish well to the Union, and promote it. But, that

"Kingdom would remain upon record to after-ages, and encourage others to follow his great example." This address being the next day presented to the Queen by the whole House, her Majesty was pleased to tell the Commons, "That she was very glad they had so just a sense of the repeated services of the Duke of Marlborough, and would consider of their address, and return an answer very speedily."

Accordingly, on the 9th of January, Mr. Secretary Hedges delivered to the House a message signed by her Majesty, importing, "That her Majesty, in consideration of the great and eminent services performed by the Lord Marlborough in the first year of her Reign, as well by his present negotiation as her Plenipotentiary at the Hague, as by his valour and good conduct in the command of the confederate armies abroad, thought fit to grant to him, and the heirs male of his body, the title of a Duke of this Realm; and as a farther mark of her favour and satisfaction with his services, and for the better support of his dignity, her Majesty granted to the said

"Duke, and the heirs male of his body, during life, a pension of five thousand pounds per annum, out of the revenue of the Post-office: And an act having passed this Session, for settling the honours and dignities of the Duke of Marlborough upon his posterity, and annexing the honour and manor of Woodstock and house of Blenheim, to go along with the said honours; it would be very agreeable to her Majesty, if the pension of five thousand pounds per annum were continued and limited by act of Parliament to his posterity, for the more honourable support of their dignities, in like manner as his honours, and the honour and manor of Woodstock, and house of Blenheim, were already limited and settled." The Commons very readily complied with this message, and an act passed for that purpose.

However, a little after, the Queen having given him the grant of the Royal Manse at Charing-Cross, (where a square was designed to be built and called after his name) the Commons, upon a motion made to confirm this grant, refused to do it.

(1) The 1706. that, which advanced it most effectually, and without which it could not have succeeded, was, that a considerable number of Noblemen and Gentlemen, who were in no engagements with the Court (on the contrary, had been disobliged and turned out of great posts, and some very lately) declared for it. These kept themselves very close and united, and seemed to have no other interest but that of their Country, and were for that reason called the Squadrons *. The chief of these were the Marquiss of Tweeddale, the Earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, Haddington, and Marchmont. They were in great credit, because they had no visible bias on their minds. Ill usage had provoked them rather to oppose the Ministry, than to concur in any thing, where the chief honour would be carried away by others. When they were spoke to by the Ministry, they answered coldly, and with great reserve; so that it was expected they would have concurred in the opposition; and, they being between twenty and thirty in number, if they had set themselves against the Union, the design must have miscarried. But they continued silent, till the first division of the House obliged them to declare; and then they not only joined in it, but promoted it effectually and with zeal.

p. 690.

There were great and long debates managed 1706. on the side of the Union by the Earls of Seafield, The Union and Stair for the Ministry, and of the Squadrons long, i. e. by the Earls of Roxburgh and Marchmont; and against it by the Dukes of Hamilton and Arbol, ^{long, i. e. in the Par-}liament of Scotland and the Marquiss of Annandale. The Duke of Arbol was believed to be in a foreign correspondence, and was much set on violent methods. The Duke of Hamilton managed the debate with great vehemence, but was against all desperate motions. He had much to lose, and was resolved not to venture all with those, who suggested the necessity of running, in the old Scots way, into extremities.

The topics (1) from which the arguments against the Union were drawn, were the antiquity and dignity of their Kingdom, which was offered to be given up, and sold: They were departing from an independent state, and going to sink into a dependency on England; what conditions soever might be now speciously offered, as a security to them, they could not expect that they should be adhered to, or religiously maintained in a Parliament, where sixteen Peers and forty-five Commons could not hold the balance, against above an hundred Peers, and five hundred and thirteen Commons. Scotland would

(1) The proceedings more at large upon the three first articles, and some other particulars, are contained in the following extract:

First article.

The Parliament having gone through the first reading of the articles, the Court-party moved, on the 1st of November, for a more particular consideration of the same, in order to approve or disallow them; and, to begin with the first, namely, That the two Kingdoms shall, May 1, 1707, be united into one. But the opposite party moved also, That the farther consideration of the articles should be delayed for some considerable time, that the sentiments of the Parliament of England about the same might be known; and that the Members of Parliament might consult those, whom they represented. However, after some debate, these two motions were let fall, and it was agreed, that the first article should be read; but that it should be allowed the next sitting to debate, whether the first article should be concluded, by approving thereof, or not; or, if the Parliament might not, before the concluding thereof, begin with, or conclude any other of the articles; and, accordingly, the first article was read. The next day, there was a debate, "Whether they should proceed immediately to the consideration of the first article of the Union, or the security of the Church?" When the vote was pressed for giving the preference to the first article of the Union, several Members urged the unreasonableness of agreeing to an Union, till they had gone through the treaty, and found, that the terms thereof were for the interest of Scotland; for if they should, in the first place, agree to the subverting the Monarchy, and sinking the Parliament, which was the purport of the first article of the treaty of Union; Who could tell but the Royal assent might be given thereto, and the Parliament adjourned; and so the Nation be united upon no terms, or, at least, upon such, as England should afterwards please to grant? This argument carrying a great deal of weight, and the House appearing generally inclined to take the terms of the Union previously into consideration, the Lord Register found an expedient to remove the difficulty, by proposing a resolve, "That the House, in the first place, proceed to take the first article of the treaty into consideration, with this proviso, that, if all the other articles of Union were not adjudged by the Parliament, then the agreeing to and approving the first article should be of no effect. And that, immediately after the first article,

"the Parliament should proceed to an act for the security of the doctrine, discipline, worship, and government of the Church, as now by law established." This being approved by the majority, the Lord Belhaven made a long speech, wherein he very pathetically lamented the miserable and despicable condition, into which Scotland was going to fall by the Union. In the next sitting, after some debate, the Marquiss of Annandale presented a resolve against an Incorporating Union; and many of the Country-party urged, that such an Union was altogether inconsistent with the honour of the Scots Nation, and destructive of its interest and concerns, both civil and military. Some went yet farther, affirming, that this scheme would infallibly be an handle to any aspiring Prince to attempt the overthrow of the liberties of all Britain; for, if the Parliament of Scotland could alter, or rather subvert its Constitution, it might be made a precedent for the Parliament of Great-Britain to do the same: And that the Representatives of Scotland, being reduced to a poor miserable condition, would intirely depend upon those, who had the purse; and, having shewn so little concern for the support of their own Constitution, it was not to be expected they would much regard that of any other. The Duke of Hamilton said, "What shall we, in half an hour, yield what our forefathers maintained with their lives and fortunes for many ages? Are here none of the defendants of those worthy Patriots, who defended the liberty of their Country against all Invaders; who assisted the Great King Robert Bruce, to restore the Constitution, and revenge the fallhood of England, and usurpation of Balliol? Where are the Douglasses and Campbells? Where are the Peers; where are the Barons, once the bulwark of the Nation? Shall we yield up the Sovereignty and Independency of the Nation, when we are commanded by those we represent, to preserve the same, and assured of their assistance to support us?" He urged a great deal more to the same purpose; but the Court-party called for a vote, which was thus stated, Approve of the first article of Union, or not. Before the question was put upon it, the Duke of Arbol gave in a protest against an Incorporating Union, as contrary to the liberties, rights, and privileges, and constitution of the Kingdom of Scotland, the birth-right of the Peers, the rights and privileges of the Barons and Burghs, and to the claim of right, property, and liberty of the Subjects: Which protest being read, his Grace took 1706. would be no more considered as formerly by foreign Princes and States: Their Peers would be precarious and elective: They magnified their Crown, with the other Regalia so much, that, since the Nation seemed resolved never to suffer them to be carried away, it was provided, in a new clause added to the articles, that these should still remain within the Kingdom. They insisted most vehemently on the danger, that the Constitution of their Church must be in, when all should be under the power of a British Parliament: This was pressed with fury by some, who were known to be the most violent enemies to Presbytery, of any in that Nation: But it was done on design, to inflame that body of men by those apprehensions, and so to engage them to persist in their opposition. To allay that heat, after the general vote was carried for the Union, before they entered on the consideration of the particular articles, an act was prepared for securing the Presbyterian Government: By which it was declared to be the only Government of that Church, unalterable in all succeeding times, and the maintaining it was declared to be a fundamental and essential article and condition of the Union; and this act was to be made a part of the act for the Union, which, in the consequence of that, was to be ratified by another act

Then the vote was put, Approve of the first article of the Union in the term of the motion (beforementioned) yes, or not? and it was carried Approve by a majority of thirty-four voices. Then it was moved, that the list of all the Members of Parliament, as they voted pro and con, be printed, which was agreed to. After which an overture for an act for security of the true Protestant Religion and Government of the Church, as by law established, within the Kingdom of Scotland, was read, and afterwards passed by a majority of seventy-four votes. However the Lord Belhaven gave in a protestation, importing, "That this act was no valid security to the Church, in case of an Incorporating Union; and that the Church could have no real and solid security by any manner of Union, by which the claim of right was unbanded, the Scots Parliament incorporated, and the distinct Sovereignty and Independency intirely abolished." To this protestation adhered the Dukes of Hamilton and Athol, the Marquis of Annandale, the Earls of Errol, Marschal, Wigton, and others.

Two days after, the second article of the Union (namely, That the Succession to the Monarchy of the United Kingdom of Great-Britain shall be to the Princess Sophia and her issue) was read, and a motion was made, "That the Parliament should proceed to settle the Succession upon regulations and limitations in the terms of the resolve mentioned in the minutes of the 4th of November, and not in the terms of the second article of the Union." This was warmly opposed by the Court-party, who urged, that the Parliament of Great-Britain would be more competent Judges of what was necessary for the good of the United Kingdoms, than that House. To which it was answered, "That any limitations made by the Parliament were alterable by a subsequent Parliament: But if, as was by some alledged, the articles of Union were to be punctually observed in all future ages, and nothing to be altered in them, without demolishing the whole structure; then it followed, that it was the general interest of all Britain to have such limitations, as were necessary to be put upon the Succession to the Crown, inserted in the articles of Union, particularly in what related to Scotland, whose representatives could but act precariously in the Parliament of Great-Britain." In the height of this debate it was moved, "To address her Majesty to lay before her the condition of the Nation, and the aversion in many persons to an Incorporating Union with England, and to acquaint her with the willingness of the House to settle the Succession in the Protestant line upon limitations; and, in order thereto, that a short recess might be granted." But this was opposed, and a vote demanded upon the second article, which at last was stated. But, before voting, the Earl Marischal gave in a protest for himself and all those, who should adhere to his protestation, importing, that no person could be designed a Successor to the Crown of that Realm, after the decease of her Majesty, and failing issue of her body, who was Successor to the Crown of England, unless that in the present Session of Parliament, or any other Session of this or any ensuing Parliament, during her Majesty's Reign, there were such conditions of Government settled and enacted, as might secure the Honour and Sovereignty of that Crown and Kingdom, the Frequency and Power of Parliament, the Religion, Liberty, and Trade of the Nation from any English or any foreign influence. To this protestation, forty-six Members having adhered, it was agreed, that a list of the Members should be printed, as they voted, Approve, or not? And that they who adhered to the protest, should likewise be marked. Then the vote was put, Approve, or not? And it was carried, Approve, by fifty-nine votes.

On the 18th of November, the third article (namely, that both Kingdoms shall be represented by one and the same Parliament) falling under consideration, the Country-party endeavoured to shew the dishonour and prejudice, that would arise to the Scots Nation from this single article, urging, "that thereby they did, in effect, sink their own Constitution, when the English

1706. act of Parliament in England. Thus those, who were the greatest enemies to Presbytery, of any in the Nation, raised the clamour of the danger that form of Government would be in, if the Union went on, to such a height, that by their means this act was carried, as far as any human law could go, for their security: For, by this, they had, not only all the security that their own Parliament could give them, but they were to have the faith and authority of the Parliament of England, it being, in the stipulation, made at 1706. essential condition of the Union: The carrying this matter so far was done, in hopes that the Parliament of England would never be brought to pass it. This act was passed, and it gave an entire satisfaction to those who were disposed to receive any; but nothing could satisfy men, who made use of this, only to inflame others.

The

"English would not allow the least alteration in theirs: That the Members of Scotland in the British Parliament would bear so small a proportion to the English, that it could not be expected, that the former should ever be able to carry any thing, that should be for the interest of Scotland, against so great a majority, who, though divided among themselves about different parties, would yet unite against the Scots, to whom they all bore a natural antipathy. That in all Nations there are Fundamentals, which admit of no alteration by any power whatsoever. That the rights and privileges of Parliament being one of these fundamentals among the Scots, no Parliament, nor any other power, could ever legally prohibit the meeting of Parliaments, or deprive any of the three Estates of its right of sitting or voting in Parliament, or give up the rights and privileges of Parliament; but that, by this treaty, the Parliament of Scotland was intirely abrogated, its rights and privileges given up, and those of the Parliament of England substituted in their place. That, if the Parliament of Scotland could alter their Fundamentals, the British Parliament might do the same; and if so, what security had the Scots for any thing stipulated in the treaty of Union, with respect either to the representation of Scotland in that Parliament, or any other privileges and immunities granted to Scotland? That though the Legislative power in Parliament were regulated and determined by a majority of voices; yet the giving up the Constitution, and the rights and privileges of the Nation, was not subject to suffrage, being founded on dominion and property; and therefore could not be legally done, without the consent of every person, who had a right to elect, and be represented in Parliament. That, by this treaty, not only the Constitution of the Parliament in general was wholly altered, or rather given up, but the Barons and Boroughs were aggrieved in their particular rights and privileges. For supposing the twenty-second article, which limits the number of Scots Peers, Barons, and Boroughs, should be rejected; yet, nevertheless, the Barons and Boroughs were still deprived of their judicial authority, to which they had an undoubted right, and of which the Parliament could not deprive their Constituents, without their own consent. That though the Barons, for their own convenience, consented to be represented by a certain number in Parliament, yet they had as good a right to sit, and vote, and advise their Sovereign, as the Peers themselves, whenever they pleased to reassume their power, of which the third and twenty-second articles deprived them. And, lastly, it was represented, that the Scots Members being obliged to reside so long in London to attend the British Parliament, that alone were sufficient to drain Scotland of all their money in specie." And it was moved, "That the agreeing to the third article, in relation to the Parliament of Great Britain, should not be binding, nor have any effect, unless terms and conditions of an Union of the two Kingdoms, and particularly the Constitution of the said Parliament, were finally adjusted and concluded, and an act passed thereupon in the Parliament; and that the said terms and conditions be also agreed to and ratified by an act of the Parliament of England; the Constitution of the Parliament of Great-Britain being left intire, until the Parliament came upon the twenty-second article." It was moved also, to proceed to the consideration of the fourth and other articles of Union before the third; but it was carried to proceed to the consideration of the third article. After a long debate, a vote was stated, Approve of the third article, in the terms of the motion relating thereto, or not? And it was carried Approve, by a majority of thirty-one votes. But, before voting, the Marquis of Amandale gave in a protest, and desired, that the Narrative of the 4th of that month of November might be prefixed thereto, being both together as follows: viz. "Whereas it evidently appears, since the printing, publishing, and considering the articles of treaty now before this House, that this Nation seems generally averse to the Incorporated Union, in the terms now before us, as subversive of the Sovereignty, fundamental Constitution, and claim of right of this Kingdom, and as threatening ruin to this Church, as by law established: And since it is plain, that if an Union was agreed to in these terms by the Parliament, and accepted of by the Parliament of England, it would in no sort answer the peaceable and friendly ends proposed by an Union, but would, on the contrary, create such dismal distractions and animosities amongst ourselves, and such jealousies and mistakes betwixt us and our neighbours, as would involve these Nations into fatal breaches and confusions. Therefore I do protest for myself, and in the name of those, who shall adhere to this my protestation, that an Incorporating Union of the Crown and Kingdom of Scotland with the Crown and Kingdom of England, and that both Nations be represented by one and the same Parliament, as contained in the articles of the treaty of Union, are contrary to the Honour, Interest, fundamental Laws and Constitution of this Kingdom, is a giving up the Sovereignty, the birth-right of the Peers, the rights and privileges of the Barons and Boroughs, and is contrary to the claim of right, property, and liberty of the Subjects, and the third act of her Majesty's Parliament, 1703, by which it is declared High-treason in any of the Subjects of this Kingdom, to quarrel, or endeavour by writing, malicious and advised speaking, or open act or deed, to alter or innovate the claim of right, or any article thereof. As also that the Subjects of this Kingdom, by surrendering the Sovereignty of Parliaments, are deprived of all security, both with respect to such rights, as are by the intended treaty stipulated and agreed, and in respect of such other rights, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, as are, by the same treaty, pretended to be reserved to them. And therefore I do protest, that this shall not prejudice the being of future Scots Parliaments and Conventions, within the Kingdom of Scotland, at no time coming." To this protest fifty two Members adhered. The next eighteen articles, from the fourth to the twenty-first, passed without any thing very remarkable; but, before the House came to the twenty-second article, which settles the number of the Representatives of Scotland in the British Parliament, Duke Hamilton, having assembled the leading Men of the party, who had long opposed the Union, exhorted them, "Not to look back upon what might have been done amiss by any amongst them, but to go forwards, and now at last to unite their efforts to save the Nation, which stood on the very brink of ruin." After all, who were present, had declared their concurrence, let the consequences be what they would, he proposed, "That the Marquis of Amandale should renew his motion

1706. The party, who opposed the Union, finding the majority against them, studied to raise a storm without doors, to terrify them. A set of addresses against the Union were sent round all the countries, in which those, who opposed it, had any interest. There came up many of these in the name of Counties and Boroughs, and at last from Parishes. This made some noise abroad, but was very little considered there, when it was known, by whose arts and practices they were procured. When this appeared to have little effect, pains were taken to animate the rabble to violent attempts, both at Edinburgh and at Glasgow. About two or three thousand Commissioners came in arms to Dumfries, and publicly burnt the articles of Union, and affixed on the Market-cross a declaration of their reasons for so doing. Sir Patrick Johnston, Lord Provost of Edinburgh, had been one of the Commissioners, and had concurred heartily in the design. A great

“for settling the Succession of the Crown upon the House of Hanover; and, as it was not to be doubted, but the same would be rejected, that then a protestation should be entered and adhered to by all, who were against the Union, who, immediately after, should in a body separate from the other Members, and leave the House, never to return again. And that, in the next place, a national address should be forthwith signed by as many hands as possible, and dispatched to the Queen; urging, that, of all measures, this was the most likely to prevail with the English to let the Union drop.” And then he offered the draught of the intended Protestation, which had been put into his hands by the Marquis of Anandale, but was thought to have been drawn up by Sir James Stuart, the Queen’s Advocate. The persons present, most of whom were professed Jacobites, having desired a day or two to take the proposal into consideration before they came to a final resolution, the Duke of Hamilton was, in the mean time, at no small pains to convince them of the reasonableness of this counsel. The greatest difficulty, with some, was the mentioning their concurrence to settle the Succession on the House of Hanover, which they said was a kind of obligation upon them to have recourse to that Family, to protect them in opposing the Union; whereas their design was to restore the Pretender to the Throne, which they thought the present ferment among the people would much advance. To this the Duke of Hamilton returned, “That this could draw no obligation upon them to adhere to the interest of the House of Hanover, since they did not protest against the motion’s being rejected; and, even supposing it were otherwise, it was not the first time they had made greater stretches, with a design, that good might come of it, and he hoped this would be the last. For, added he, this bold protestation, backed by the separation, will not only confound the English, but likewise encourage our Countrymen, and engage them to support us. And, for my part, I am of opinion, that, if the English do not desist from prosecuting the Union, we must have recourse to arms, and call over the King; nor do I doubt but the Nation will concur with us, to save themselves from utter ruin.” By these arguments and considerations all were brought over, and at the next meeting declared their approbation, promising to adhere to the protestation, which, it was taken for granted, the Duke of Hamilton would present; only the Duke of Arbuthnot could by no reasons be prevailed upon to adhere to the protestation, on account of the clause relating to the house of Hanover; but he engaged to join with the rest in leaving the House, and concerting further measures. All things being thus adjusted, and the next day appointed for the execution, great numbers of Gentlemen and eminent Citizens flocked that morning about the Parliament-House, to wait the issue, and, in case of need, to assist the separating Members. But all their hopes were soon defeated; for the Duke of Hamilton, pretending to be seized with a violent tooth-ach, refused to go to the House. Some of his friends having boldly expostulated with him about his fluctuating and ambiguous conduct, which bore so near a resemblance to that of his Grandfather, in the Reign of King Charles I., he was at last prevailed with to go to the Parliament-House; but, notwithstanding all the pressing instances his friends made to engage him to present the intended protestation, he still refused to do it, and only promised to be the first adherer. So much time was therefore spent in this private contest among the Cavaliers, that the opportunity was lost, and, in a few days, great numbers of those who had strenuously opposed the Union, left the House in despair; so that, when the twenty-second article came to be read and debated, it met with little or no opposition. Only, before approving the first paragraph, Mr. George Lockhart of Carmichael entered a protest, with relation to the privileges of the Barons; as the Duke of Arbuthnot did another, relating to the several branches of that article; the Earl of Buchan a third, with relation to the rights of the Peers; Sir Walter Stuart of Pardovan a fourth, in behalf of the Peers, Barons, and Boroughs; the Earl of Errol a fifth, with relation to his hereditary office of High-Constable; and the Earl of Marischal a sixth, in relation to his hereditary office of Earl-Marshal of Scotland. The Earl of Marchmont inveighed and protested in very severe terms against these protestations, as presumptuous, illegal, unwarrantable, and seditious; after which, the first paragraph of the twenty-second article was approved by a majority of forty voices; and then the second paragraph, relating to the calling the Representatives of Scotland to the Parliament of Great-Britain, was also approved with some amendments.

On the 8th of January it was moved in Parliament, that the protests given in the former sitting by the Duke of Arbuthnot, Earl of Buchan, George Lockhart of Carmichael, and Walter Stuart, should be neither inserted in the minutes, nor printed; and the Earl of Marchmont gave in a protestation against these four protests, and the Lord-Chancellor, the Marquis of Montrose, President of the Council, the Duke of Argyle, the Marquisses of Tweeddale and Lothian, and most of the well-affected to the Union, adhered thereto. The next day, the Lord Balmerino gave in a protestation against that of the Earl of Marchmont, to which the Duke of Hamilton and his party adhered; and after some debate it was agreed, that none of these protests be inserted at length in the minutes, or printed, but that they be all recorded in the books of Parliament. Then, the third paragraph of the twenty-second article being approved, the remaining part of the article was read, and after some reasoning, and reading of the oaths, to which it relates, an oath was given in for an additional clause, for explaining the word limitation, mentioned in the oath appointed to be taken by Stat. 13 Will. III. Cap. 6; as also an overture for exempting persons in any office or employment in Scotland, from taking the oath of abjuration mentioned in the article. A third overture was also given in for a clause, importing, “That, so long as the act appointing the Sacramental Test shall continue in force in England, all persons in public trust, within the limits of Scotland, shall swear, and sign a Formula thereto subjoined, in manner, and under the penalty therein mentioned.” After reading these three overtures, and reasoning thereon, a vote was started, Approve of the twenty-second article of Union as explained, or not? But before voting it was agreed, that, notwithstanding the vote, and that the article should thereby be approved, it should nevertheless be in force and free afterwards to proceed on the overtures next sitting, and to the Parliament to give their sentiments thereon: And, it being thereupon moved to adjourn the vote for approving the article till next sitting, a previous vote was stated, Proceed or Delay? And it was 1706. great multitude gathered about the House, and were forcing the doors, on design, as was believed, to murder him; but Guards came and dispersed them. Upon this attempt, the Privy-Council published a proclamation, the next day, against tumults, and gave orders for quartering the Guards within the town. But, to shew that this was not intended to over-awe the Parliament, the whole matter was laid before them, and the proceedings of the Privy-Council were approved. Although no person of distinction appeared among the rioters, yet it was no difficult matter to guess from what quarter that disturbance came, since, at the same time, that they insulted the High-Commissioner, and other well-wishers to the Union, they attended the Duke of Hamilton with loud acclamations, as he passed the streets to and from the Parliament. However, no other considerable attempt was made after this; but the body of the people shewed so much fullness, that probably, had any person of authority once kindled the fire, they seemed to be of such combustible ried, Proceed. Then the vote being put, Approve the twenty-second article, as explained, or not, it was carried Approve.

On the 10th of January, the overture for exempting persons in any office or employment in Scotland from taking the oath of abjuration, mentioned in the twenty-second article of Union, being read, and dropped, the overture for an additional clause to the twenty-second article, for explaining the word limitation, mentioned in the oath appointed to be taken by 13 W. III. Cap. 6, was again read, viz. "Like as it is declared, that, by the word limitation in the oath mentioned in the above article, is only understood, entail of the Succession, and not the conditions of Government upon the Successor; for; and that all persons of Scotland, who may be liable to take the oath, swear it in that sense only." But, after some debate, the vote being put for adding the said clause, it was carried in the negative. Then the third overture, for a clause to be added to the twenty-second article, mentioned in the minutes of the last sitting, was again read in these terms: "And further it is agreed, that, so long as that part of the second act, Ann. 25, Cap. 20, appointing a Sacramental Test, shall stand and continue in force in England, all persons in publick trust, civil or military, within the limits of Scotland, shall swear and sign the Formula underwritten, within six months after the commencement of the Union; and all, who shall be admitted to any publick trust thereafter, shall, before the exercising their office of trust, swear and subscribe the same; to be administered by the Lords of the Privy-Council, or any one of them, under the like penalties and disabilities, as are provided by the foresaid act, made in the Parliament of England." The Formula was thus: "I A. B. do sincerely declare, in the presence of God, that I own the Presbyterian Government of the Church, as by Law established in Scotland, to be a lawful Government of the Church; and that I shall never, directly nor indirectly, endeavour the subversion thereof, nor any alteration in the Worship, Discipline, or Government of the Church, as by law established: So help me God." But, after some debate, this clause was rejected by a majority of thirty-five voices. Then the twenty-third article of Union was read, and, on the 13th of January, an overture was given in for adding a clause thereto, in these words: "With this express prohibition, that none of the Peers of Scotland shall have personal protection within Scotland, for any debt owing before the commencement of the Union." As also another overture, for adding a clause, importing, "That all the Peers of that part of Great-Britain, called Scotland, qualified according to law, should, after the Union, have the right to sit covered in the House of Peers of Great-Britain, notwithstanding that the right to give vote therein belong only to the sixteen Peers, who were summoned in the manner appointed by the preceding article." After reasoning upon these two overtures, and upon two separate motions, the first in relation to allowing all the Peers of Scotland to sit upon the trial of the Peers of Britain; and the other in relation to their precedence according to their patents; the vote was stated in these terms, Approve the twenty-third article of Union, or alter, referring intire the consideration of the above two overtures, and whether the same shall be added to the article; and it was carried, Approve. Then the first overture for the clause in relation to personal protection, and the second clause in relation to all the Peers of Scotland sitting covered in the House of Peers of Great-Britain, were debated, and both severally rejected.

The next day, the twenty-fourth article was read; Jan. 14. whereupon a memorial was given for Lyon King at Arms, in relation to his precedence; which being read and debated, it was at last agreed, that his rank should be left to her Majesty. There was another clause offered to be added to the twenty-fourth article, "That the Crown, Scepter, and Sword of State, Records of Parliament, and all other Records, Rolls, and Registers whatsoever, both public and private, general and particular, and Warrants thereof, continue to be kept, as they are, in that part of the united Kingdom, now called Scotland; and that they shall so remain in all times coming, notwithstanding the Union." Which, being read, was agreed to be added, and was accordingly subjoined, and the article, thus amended, read over and approved; as was also the twenty-fifth article, without any opposition.

On the 15th of January, the draught of an act, ratifying and approving the treaty of Union of the two Kingdoms of Scotland and England was given in, and offered to be read: Whereupon it was moved, That the Parliament should first proceed to the Constitution of the manner of electing the Representatives for Scotland to the Parliament of Great-Britain; and either now determine that matter, or appoint a day for that end. After debate the vote was stated, "Proceed to the ratification of the treaty of Union, and act for security of the Protestant Religion and Presbyterian Church-Government, or to the Constitution of the manner of electing the Representatives of Scotland." But, before voting, it was agreed, that, in case it should be carried to proceed to the ratification, the Parliament, would, immediately after passing the act of ratification, proceed to the Constitution of the manner of electing the Representatives for Scotland. Then the vote being put, it was carried to proceed to the ratification: After which, the draught of the act, ratifying, approving, and at length narrating the articles of Union, as enlarged, explained, and amended, and the act of security of the Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Church-Government, was read; and, after some discourse, a first reading was marked thereon. The next day, the act was read a second time; and then the act for security of the Protestant Religion, and Presbyterian Church-Government, inserted in, and ratified by that act, was touched with the royal Scepter. Immediately after this, there was laid before the House a representation and petition of the Church of Scotland, importing, "That being informed, that the Parliament were passing an act of ratification of the articles of the treaty of Union, declaring, That the Parliament of England might provide for the security of the Church of England, as they should think expedient, to take place with the Kingdom of England, and not derogating from the security provided for the Church of Scotland: Which clause seemed to them not only to be like a blank, put into the hands of the Parliament of England, to exact what they should think fit, for securing the Hierarchy and Ceremonies of their Church; but also a consent, that it be an article and fundamental of the Union: They there-

He despaired of succeeding, and he apprehended, that his person might be in danger. A friend of his wrote to the Lord Treasurer Godolphin, representing the ill temper the Nation was generally in, and moved for an adjournment, that so, with the help of some time and good management, those difficulties, that seemed then insurmountable, might be brought to a happy issue.

1706. sooner's answer was, that a delay was, upon the matter, laying the whole design aside. Orders were given both in England and Ireland to have troops ready upon call; and, if it were necessary, more forces should be ordered from Flanders. The French were in no condition to send any assistance to those, who might break out; so that the circumstances of the time were favourable. The Lord Godolphin desired therefore, that they would go on, and not be alarmed at the foolish behaviour of some, who, whatever might be given out in their name, he believed, had more

"Church and State." An Act for the security of the Presbyterian Church Government in Scotland, having already been passed, this representation was, by all sober men, looked upon as frivolous and impertinent; and the Duke of Hamilton, in retaliation for his privilege of the first vote in Parliament, which was opposed by a counter-privilege from the Duke of Hamilton, the Act for ratifying and approving the Scott Nation, &c. was approved by one hundred and ten voices, and touched with the Royal Scepter.

(1) The common people are said to have been so enraged, that they threatened to come up in a body to the Parliament. But none showed more zeal on this occasion than the Western Shires, where a vast number of people, and chiefly the Camererians, were willing to venture their all to oppose the Union; for which purpose they had several meetings, divided themselves into regiments, chose their Officers; provided themselves with horses, arms, and ammunition; mentioned the Restoration of the King, as the only means to save their Country; were so far reconciled to the Northern parts, and Episcopal party (whom they formerly hated on account of their different principles in Religion) that they were inclined to concert measures with them, and had appointed correspondents in all places throughout the Kingdom to strengthen and encourage their party, and to feel the pulse of those Members of Parliament, who were against the Union. There was one Cunningham of Edin, who had been very forward in promoting the Union, but who, upon the peace of Ryswick, the Regent, whereof he was Major, being broke, he went to Darien, and, after the ruin of that enterprize, returning to Scotland, he lived privately and meanly at his country-house. He had no prospect of application for an employment, but though new levies were made, upon the war breaking out again, he could never obtain to be provided for in the army, which he ascribed to his having been employed by the Darien Company, and at which he was not a little disgusted. As he waited for an opportunity to shew his resentment, he was soon known to the Western agents, and, being of the Presbyterian principles, intirely trusted by them. Having concerted measures with Mr. Brisbane of Bishoptown, Mr. Cochrane of Kilmeronock, and Mr. Lachart of Carrawath, three staunch Cavaliers, who assured him, that the Duke of Hamilton approved his design of bringing up the Camererians to dissolve the Parliament, and that the Duke of Abol readily undertook to cause his Highlanders to secure the pass of Stirling, to open a communication with the Northern parts, Major Cunningham took a progress through the Western shires, and, by his dextrous management, brought together in a confederacy, that seven or eight thousand men, well armed, were ready to rendezvous at the town of Hamilton, in order to march forwards to Edinburgh under his command. But, a day or two before they were to meet, the Duke of Hamilton, without acquainting any of those who had concerted this design, sent privately expresses through the whole Country, strictly requiring them to put it off till another time; so that not above five hundred, more forward than the rest, came to the place appointed, which intirely broke Major Cunningham's measures. What induced the Duke of Hamilton to act as he did on this occasion, the Scott Memorial, who was privy to the design, leaves undetermined, acquainting us, "That some swore he had made his terms with the Court; others saying, that he was afraid to venture, by reason of his estate in England; and that the only thing, that was alleged in his behalf, was, that he thought the Nation was not in a condition to carry on such an enterprize at that time, because the English had sent their troops to the borders, and more forces might soon be wasted over from Holland, and so the Scott Nation be undone." But Fletcher of Salton used to declare to his friends, that this conduct of the Duke fully convinced him of his treachery to his party. This project of dissolving the Parliament, carried on by Cunningham, having miscarried, the party bethought themselves of another expedient to prevent the Union, which was (according to a precedent in the minority of James the Fifth) to invite as many of the Barons, Freeholders, and Heretors, as could possibly be got, to Edinburgh, that they might in a body attend the Lord High-Commissioner, and (by a Prolocutor) intreat his Grace, either to lay aside the intended Union, or, at least, to grant a recess, until they had informed the Queen of the present temper and disposition of the Nation, and obtained an order for calling a new Parliament, to provide against the calamities that were like to ensue: And, whether, his Grace granted, or refused this demand, they resolved that a national address, to that purpose, should be signed, and forthwith sent up to the Queen. This counsel came first from the Duke of Abol, and Mr. Fletcher of Salton; and, being relished and recommended by the Duke of Hamilton, was generally approved by the Cavaliers, who acquainted their friends in the country with the design, and desired them to come privately to Edinburgh, against a certain prefixed day. In the mean time, Mr. Henry Meul, brother to the Earl of Pannure, was pitched upon for the Prolocutor; and the form of an address to the Queen concerted and agreed to, by all who were in the secret; wherein they made it their most humble supplication to her Majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to discountenance this treaty, and call both a new Parliament and a General Assembly of the Church of that Kingdom. Against the day appointed, above five hundred Gentlemen were actually come to Edinburgh, and many more were upon the road: But, the very next day, the Duke of Hamilton acquainted those in concert with him, That, unless they added a clause to the address, intimating their readiness to settle the Succession in the House of Hannover, he would by no means be concerned in it; urging, that, without such a clause, the English Tories, who (it was expected) would oppose the Union in the English Parliament, could have no foundation to go upon. This objection was no small surprize to the Cavaliers, who generally looked upon it as intended to break the design; since the Duke of Hamilton could not be ignorant, that the far greater part of the Gen-

1706, more wit than to ruin themselves (1). Every step that was made, and every vote that was carried, was with the same strength, and met with the same opposition: Both parties giving strict attendance during the whole Session, which lasted three months. Many protestations were printed, with every man's vote. In conclusion, the whole articles of the treaty were agreed to, with some small variations.

Death of the Earl of Stair.

The Earl of Stair, who had all along exerted himself with great zeal in favour of the Union, and who, tho' much indisposed, came on the 7th of January to the Parliament-House, and maintained the debate upon the twenty-second article, died suddenly the next night, his spirits being quite exhausted by the length and vehemence of the debates. He was son of Sir James Dalrymple, formerly President of the Session, and afterwards created Viscount and Earl of Stair. He was succeeded in honour and estate by his son the Lord John Dalrymple.

The manner of electing the sixteen Peers.

As soon as the act for ratifying the treaty of Union was passed, the next business, which the Parliament went upon, was the preparing an act for settling the manner of electing the sixteen Peers and forty-five Commoners, to represent Scotland in the Parliament of Great-Britain; and on the 22d of January, the Question was put, Whether the sixteen Peers should be sent by rotation or election? And it was carried by election. And then upon the Question, Whether the election should be by ballotting, or by open election? It was carried for the latter. It was also debated, what proportion the Shires and Boroughs should have of the forty-five Members, that were to sit in the House of Commons of Great-Britain; and it was agreed, that thirty should be the number for the Shires, and fifteen the number for the Boroughs. It was resolved, that the Borough of Edinburgh, by itself, should have one Representative; and then a scheme, dividing the Boroughs into fifteen districts, one of which was to have one Representative, was given in; read, and approved.

On the 31st of January, the Parliament proceeded to consider the motion, for allowing the Commissioners for the treaty of Union their expences; and a Resolve was brought in, for allowing each Nobleman twelve thousand pounds Scots, and each other Commissioner six thousand pounds; their Secretary four thousand eight hundred pounds; and to each of the three Accountants two thousand four hundred pounds Scots, out of the equivalent, pari passu, with public debts, after the African Company: Which, after some debate, was approved. Then it was moved and agreed, That the Commissioners for the treaty in 1702, should likewise be allowed their expences; viz. each Nobleman five hundred pounds; each Baron three hundred pounds; and each Borough two hundred pounds sterling: Which sums were declared to be a public debt, and referred to the Committee to state the same as such. After this it was moved, "That no Representative to the Parliament of Great-Britain, either for Shire or Borough, should have any allowance for their charges in attending the same." But, this being adjourned to the next sitting, on the 3d of February, it was then resolved, "That nothing in relation to the expences of the Representatives of Shires and Boroughs, should be inserted in the act for settling the manner of electing the sixteen Peers, and forty-five Commoners." Then it was moved, "That at all meetings of the Peers for electing their Representatives, such Peers as were absent, be allowed to vote by proxy; the parties being Peers, and they and their Constituents being qualified by taking the oaths required by law. And thy the absent Peers might either vote by their proxies, or by sending up a list subscribed by them." And, after reasoning thereon, it was carried for allowing proxies. Afterwards it was agreed, tlemen, who were come up to Edinburgh, would never consent to such a clause. Two or three days being spent in endeavouring to make up this difference, the Country Gentlemen grew weary of spending their time and money to no purpose, so that many of them returned home; and the Government, having been informed of the design, resolved to put an effectual stop to it.

(1) Besides the precautions used to preserve the public tranquillity, and protect the well-affected from the insults of the male-contentes, other methods were employed to remove the obstacles, which the Union met with in the House. The Lord Godolphin prevailed with the Queen to lend her Seals Treasury the sum of twenty thousand pounds, which the Earl of Glasgow is said to distribute to the best advantage, and for which he, some years after, accounted with the Commissioners of public accounts. Lockhart gives a list of the persons, to whom, the Earl declared upon oath, he distributed the money.

1706. agreed, that the meeting of the Peers, for the election, should be at any place the Queen should appoint within the Kingdom of Scotland; as also, that, in case of the decease or promotion of any of the forty-five Commons, to be chosen by this Session of Parliament to the Parliament of Great-Britain, the district, for which he was a Member, upon a writ directed to them for that effect, should chuse another in his place. And it was agreed likewise, that, in case of the decease of any of the sixteen Peers, the Peers should meet and elect another in the room of the deceased, upon a writ directed to them for that purpose. Then it was moved, That such Peers of Scotland, who were also Peers of England, who, after the Union, should be created Peers of Great-Britain, should have no vote in the election of the sixteen Peers from Scotland to the Parliament of Great Britain: And, after some debate, it was agreed, that nothing, in relation to this motion, should be inserted in the act. It was also agreed, that, when the Commissioners for Boroughs, who should meet for electing their Representatives, should happen to be equal, the President of the Meeting should have the casting vote; and that the Commissioners for the eldest Borough, should preside at the first meeting, and the Commissioners for the other Boroughs by turns, as the Boroughs were then called in the Rolls of Parliament. After this, the act for settling the manner of election was approved and confirmed by the touch of the Royal Scepter. The same day, a proclamation concerning the coin was brought in from the Committee, read, voted, and approved. A few days after, the House proceeded to elect the Representatives for Scotland in the first Parliament of Great-Britain; and, the Three Estates having retired to their usual places, they returned, and reported their respective elections. As it was resolved, that the Parliament of England should sit out its period, which by the law for Triennial Parliaments, ran yet a year farther, in order to have another Session continued of the same men who had made the Union (since they would more readily consolidate and strengthen their own work) so, upon this ground, it seemed most proper, that the Members to represent Scotland should be named by the Parliament there. Those, who had opposed the Union, carried their aversion to the Squadrons so far, that they concurred with the Ministry in a nomination, in which very few of them were included, not above three Peers, and fifteen Commons; so that great exceptions lay against many who were nominated to represent that Kingdom: All this was very acceptable to the opposers of the Union (1).

The remainder of the Session was spent, among other affairs, in examining the accounts of the African and Indian Company, and providing for the due application of the Equivalent. In disposing of this sum, great partialities appeared, which were much complained of, but there was not strength to oppose them. The Ministry, and those who depended on them, moved for very extravagant allowances to those, who had been employed in this last, and in the former treaty; and they made large allotments, of some public debts, that were complained of as unreasonable and unjust; by which, a great part of the sum was diverted, from answering the end, for which it was given. This was much opposed by the Squadrons; but as the Ministers promoted it, and those, who were to get by it, made all the interest they could to obtain it (some few of them only excepted, who, as became generous Patriots, shewed more regard to the public, than to their private ends) so those, who had opposed the Union, were not ill pleased to see this sum so misapplied: hoping, by that means, that the aversion, which they endeavoured to infuse into the Nation against the Union, would be much increased; therefore they let every thing go as the Ministers proposed, to the great grief of those, who wished well to the public (2).

1706. The business of the Session being ended, the High-Commissioner went to the Parliament-House in great solemnity, being attended by the whole troop of Life-guards, and all the Nobility and Gentry in their coaches, and, having touched with the Royal Scepter several acts, made the following speech to the Parliament :

My Lords and Gentlemen,

THE public business of this Session being now over, it is full time to put an end to do it. I am persuaded, that we and our posterity will reap the benefit of the Union of the Two Kingdoms ; and, I doubt not, but, as this Parliament has had the honour to conclude it, you will, in your several stations, recommend to the people of this Nation a grateful sense of her Majesty's goodness and great care for the welfare of her Subjects, in bringing this important affair to perfection ; and that you will promote an universal desire in this Kingdom, to become one in heart and affections, as we are inseparably joined in interest with our neighbour Nation.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I have a very deep sense of the assistance and respect I have met with from you in this Session of Parliament ; and I shall omit no occasion of shewing, to the utmost of my power, the grateful remembrance I have of it."

The Parliament being adjourned to the 22d of April, the Duke returned to the Queen's palace in the same solemnity as he went to the House, and gave a splendid entertainment to the Nobility and Gentry. The day before, the draught of a letter from the Parliament to the Queen was brought in, voted, and approved ; and, the Duke having thus happily concluded this Session, and surmounted all the difficulties, which he met with, he set out, a few days after, for London, where he arrived, the 16th of April, being met several miles out of town by many Noblemen and Gentlemen in their coaches, to the number of above forty, and by near four hundred persons on horse-back. The next morning he waited upon the Queen at Kensington, where he was very graciously received.

The second Session of the second Parliament of Q. Anne. It was the general opinion, and perhaps the first resolution of the Court, that the Parliament of England should not sit, till that of Scotland had finished the affair of the Union ; but, that drawing into a great length, and the Queen's occasions not admitting of delays, the Parliament of England, which, on the 21st of November, had been further prorogued to the 3d of December, met that day at Westminster ; and the Queen, being come to the House of Peers with the usual solemnity, made the following speech to both Houses :

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I Hope we are all met together at this time with hearts truly thankful to Almighty God, for the glorious success, with which he has blessed our arms and those of our Allies, through the whole course of this year ; and with serious and steady resolutions to prosecute the advantages we have gained, till we reap the desired fruit of them in an honourable and durable peace. The goodness of God has brought this happy prospect so much nearer to us, that, if we be not wanting to ourselves, we may, upon good grounds, hope to see such a balance of power established in Europe, that it shall no longer be at the pleasure of one Prince to disturb the repose, and indanger the liberties of this part of the world. A just consideration of the present posture of affairs, of the circumstances of our enemies, and the good disposition of our Allies, must needs excite an uncommon zeal, and animate us to exert our utmost endeavours, at this critical conjuncture."

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" As I am fully persuaded you are all of this mind, so I must earnestly desire you to grant me supplies sufficient for carrying on the war next year in so effectual a manner, that we may be able to improve every where the advantages of this successful campaign. And I assure you, I shall make it my business to see all you give applied to those ends with the greatest care and management."

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" In pursuance of the powers vested in me by act of Parliament, both in England and Scotland, I appointed Commissioners to treat of an Union between the two Kingdoms. And though this be a work of such a nature, as could not but be attended with great difficulties, yet such has been the application of the Commissioners, that they have concluded a treaty, which is at this time before the Parliament of Scotland ; and, I hope, the mutual advantages of an intire Union of the two Kingdoms will be found so apparent, that it will not be long before I shall have an opportunity of acquainting you with the success, which it has met with there. Your meeting at this time being later than usual, I cannot conclude, without earnestly recommending to you to give as much dispatch

"them will admit, it being of the greatest "consequence, that both our friends and our "enemies should be fully convinced of your "firmness, and the vigour of your proceed"ings."

This speech was received with uncommon applause both within and without doors; and, two days after, each House, in a body, attended the Queen with their congratulatory addresses. The Lords, in particular, took notice of "the universal joy and satisfaction, upon the public declaration, which her Majesty, in concert with the States-General, made to the Ministers of the other Confederate Princes, that no negotiations of peace should be entered into, but in conjunction with all the Members of the Grand Alliance: Which generous method would prevent the indirect and dangerous practice of the common enemy; put a stop to clandestine and corrupt transactions; and must not only remove all present jealousies from the Allies, but create in them a lasting confidence and reliance on her Majesty's honour and justice." This was intended to keep the Queen steady to the measures, which had been suggested to her by the Duke of Marlborough and the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin, upon a well-grounded surmise, that Mr. Secretary Harley, who had, by this time, insinuated himself very deep into the Queen's confidence, endeavoured to infuse pacific counsels; which were more agreeable to the Queen's temper, and more suitable to his own ambitious designs. The Commons, on their part, passed also a compliment on the Ministry, by telling the Queen, "That the experience they had of the prudent Administration, and the great care and management in the application of the public aids, encouraged them to assure her, that they would cheerfully give such speedy and effectual supplies, as, by the continuance of God's blessing upon her arms, might establish the balance of power in Europe by a safe, honourable, and lasting peace." To both these addresses, the Queen returned very gracious answers.

Pursuant to their promise, the Commons proceeded on the Supply with all imaginable dispatch. In less than a week they voted the necessary sums for the fleet and army, granted an aid of four shillings in the pound upon all lands, and continued the duties upon malt. Upon presenting these money-bills, the Speaker of the Commons made a speech to her Majesty, importing, "That as the glorious victory obtained by the Duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was so surprizing, that the battle was fought, before it could be thought the armies were in the field; so it was no less surprizing,

"that the Commons had granted Supplies to her Majesty, before her enemies could well know, that her Parliament was sitting." And the Queen, on her part, made a speech to both Houses, wherein having repeated to them "her great satisfaction in their several addresses, in the zeal they had expressed in them for her service, and the common cause of Europe, which could not fail of being a great encouragement to all their Allies, and in the notice they had taken of the eminent services of the Duke of Marlborough;" she thanked the Commons, in a very particular manner, for the more than usual dispatch of the bills of Supply." In the close of this speech, the Queen said, "She supposed they would think it convenient to make some short recess during the holidays;" whereupon the Lords adjourned to the 30th, and the Commons to the 31st of December.

The Queen closed the year with two triumphal processions. At the request of the City of London, she ordered, that the standards and colours taken at the battle of Ramillies, and which were lately brought from the Netherlands, should be put up in Guilddhall, as trophies of that victory. A detachment of the Horse-guards and Horse-grenadiers, and a battalion of the Foot-guards, were drawn up on the parade in St. James's Park; and having received the colours and standards, which had been laid up at Whitehall, they proceeded in the following manner: First, the troop of Horse-grenadiers; then the detachment of the three troops of the Horse-guards, twenty-six of the Gentlemen in the center, carrying each a standard taken from the enemy. The battalion of Foot-guards closed the march, sixty-three of the Pikemen carrying each one of the enemy's colours instead of their pikes. In this manner they marched through the Park and St. James's Meuse, where the Queen was pleased to see them pass by from the Lady Fitzbarding's lodgings; the guns in the Park being fired at the same time; and so they proceeded down Pall-Mall, the Strand, &c. to Guilddhall. The Duke of Marlborough having been invited by the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen to dine with them in the City, he went thither the same day about noon, accompanied by the Lord-Treasurer, and the Dukes of Somerset and Ormond, in one of the Queen's coaches, and was followed by a train of other coaches, in which were several of the Nobility, the foreign Ministers, and other persons of Quality, with the Generals, and other chief Officers of the army. They were received at Temple-Bar by the City Marshal, and were conducted to Vintners-Hall, where a splendid entertainment was provided for them; and they were attended, both going and coming, with great acclamations from the people (1).

The

(1) The creations and promotions at this time were as follows: Towards the middle of December the Queen was pleased to create Henry, Earl of Kent, Lord-Chamberlain of her Household, Viscount Goderrick in the County of Hereford, Earl of Harrold in the County of Bedford, and Marquis of Kent. A few days after her Majesty was also pleased to create Robert, Earl of Lindsey, Lord Great-Chamberlain of England, Marquis of Lindsey in the County of Lincoln; Evelyn, Earl of Kington, Marquis of Dorchester in the County of Dorset; Thomas, Lord Wharton, Viscount Winchendon in the County of Bucks, and Earl of Wharton in the County of Wiltshire; John, Lord Peulet, of Hinton St. George in the County of Somerset, Earl Peulet; Sidney, Lord Godolphin, Lord-High-Treasurer of England, Viscount Rialton, and Earl of Godolphin in the County of Cornwall; Hugh, Lord Chalmadely, Viscount Malpas, and Earl of Chalmadely in the County of Cheshire; Henry, Lord Walden, Son and Heir apparent of Henry, Earl of Suffolk.

1706. The Queen having, by proclamation, appointed a general thanksgiving to be observed on the last of December, for the great successes of her Arms, and those of her Allies, the last campaign, she went to the Cathedral of St. Paul's, attended by both Houses of Parliament, the Great Officers of State, the Judges, and other publick Officers, with the same solemnity and ceremonies, as were used before after the victory gained at Ramillies, so that she gave her subjects the joyful spectacles of two triumphs in one year. The Bishop of Salisbury preached the sermon upon this occasion. The same day both Houses adjourned themselves to the 7th of January, and at their meeting again the Commons thanked the Bishop for his sermon.

Debate in the House of Lords about the Union.

Pr. H. L. II. 106. Hitherto every thing had gone very smoothly in both Houses of Parliament; but, on the 10th of January, the Earl of Nottingham acquainted the House of Peers, that he had something of great consequence to lay before them; and therefore desired, that they would name a day this to receive it in a full House. The Lords having appointed the Tuesday following, and ordered their Members in and about London to attend; the Earl of Nottingham, in a set speech represented to them, "That the Union of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland was a matter of the highest importance, and a work of so much difficulty, that all the attempts that had been made towards it in the last century, had proved ineffectual. That, the Parliament of Scotland having thought fit to secure the Presbyterian Church-Government in that Kingdom, it became the wisdom of the Parliament of England to provide betimes against the dangers, with which the Church, by law established, was threatened, in case the Union was accomplished. And therefore he moved, that an address be presented to the Queen, humbly to desire her Majesty, that the proceedings, both of the Commissioners for the treaty of Union, and of the Parliament of Scotland, relating to that matter, be laid before them." He was seconded by the Earl of Rockeford, who declared, "That he was for an Union, and had been so for twenty years past; but that he had a few doubts in the matter, and therefore was for entering upon the debate of that important affair as soon as possible." The Duke of Buckingham spoke to the same purpose, adding, "That the Union of both Kingdoms had been upon the anvil since the accession of King James I. to the English Throne; and as it could not be expected, that so weighty a matter, which took up so much time and labour before, should now be completed in a few days, therefore he was for taking it forthwith into consideration."

The Treasurer Gedolpin answered, "That this affair was not yet ripe for them to debate; and that they need not doubt, but that her Majesty would communicate to the Parliament of England all the proceedings relating to the Union, as soon as that of Scotland should have gone through with it." 1706. The Lords Wharton, Sommers, and Hallifax spoke on the same side, and urged, "That it was an honour to this Nation, that the treaty of Union should first come ratified from the Parliament of Scotland; and that then, and not before, was the proper time for the Lords to take the same into consideration." The other party finding, that they were too weak to carry a question, the Earl of Nottingham's motion was dropped.

Though the grant of the Supplies went on quicker than was usual, there was one particular, to which great objections were made. When several accounts and estimates were laid before the Commons, in relation to monies, either advanced to the Duke of Savoy and King Charles of Spain, or expended in the expedition under the Earl Rivers, it was found that these extraordinary Supplies amounted to about eight hundred thousand pounds more than had been provided for by Parliament. Some complained of this, and said, if a Ministry could thus run the Nation into a great charge, and expect the Parliament must pay the reckoning, this might have very ill consequences. But it was answered, a Ministry deserved public thanks, who had followed our advantages with such vigour: If any thing was raised without necessity, or ill applied, under pretence of serving the public, it was very reasonable to inquire into it, and to let it fall heavy on those who were in fault: But, if no other exception lay to it, than because the matter could not be foreseen, nor communicated to the Parliament before those accidents happened that occasioned the expence, it was a very unjust discouragement, if Ministers were to be quarrelled with for their care and zeal: So it was carried by a majority of two hundred and fifty voices against one hundred and five, that the several sums, for the extraordinary services of the year 1706, had been expended for the preservation of the Duke of Savoy, for the interest of King Charles of Spain against the common enemy, and for the safety and honour of the Nation. All the other Supplies (and among them the equivalent for Scotland) were given and lodged on good funds, so that no Session of Parliament had ever raised so much, and secured it so well, as this had done.

By this time the act of the Parliament of Scotland, for ratifying the treaty of Union, was sent up to London. Upon which the Queen (Jan. 28.) came to the House of Peers, and made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

HAVING acquainted you, at the opening of this Session, that the treaty for an Union between England and Scotland, which had been concluded here by the Commissioners appointed for that purpose, in pursuance of the powers given by the Parliaments of both Kingdoms, was then under consideration of the Parliament of Scotland; I can now, with the County of Kent; and Sir Thomas Pelham, Bart. likewise a Peer by the name and title of Lord Pelham, Baron of Laughton in the County of Suffex.

Suffolk, Baron of Chesterfield in the County of Essex, and Earl of Bindon in the County of Dorset; the Lord-Keeper, a Peer of this Kingdom by the name and title of William, Lord Cowper, Baron of Wingham in No. 50. Vol. III.

1706-7. " with great satisfaction, inform you, that the said treaty has been ratified by act of Parliament in Scotland, with some additions and alterations.

" I have directed the treaty, agreed to by the Commissioners of both Kingdoms, and also the act of ratification from Scotland, to be laid before you; and I hope it will meet with your concurrence and approbation.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

" It being agreed by this treaty, that Scotland is to have an Equivalent for what that Kingdom is obliged to contribute towards paying the debts of England, I must recommend to you, that, in case you agree to the treaty, you would take care to provide for the payment of the Equivalent to Scotland accordingly.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" You have now an opportunity before you of putting the last hand to a happy Union of the two Kingdoms; which, I hope, will be a lasting blessing to the whole Island, a great addition to its Wealth and Power, and a firm security to the Protestant Religion.

" The advantages, which will accrue to us all from an Union, are so apparent, that I will add no more, but that I shall look upon it as a particular happiness, if this great work which has been so often attempted without success, can be brought to perfection in my Reign."

The articles of Union presented to the House of Commons.

The Commons being returned to their House, the Lord Coningsby, by the Queen's command, presented to the House the articles of Union agreed upon by the Commissioners, the act of Parliament in Scotland for the ratification of them, and a copy of the minute-book of the proceedings of the Commissioners, which were ordered to be printed. Then a motion being made by the Tory-party, and the question being put, " That an address be presented to her Majesty, that she would be pleased to give orders, that the minutes of the proceedings of the former Commissioners, appointed in the first year of her Reign to treat of an Union, be laid before the House;" it passed in the negative. It was afterwards resolved, " That an address be presented to her Majesty, returning her the humble thanks of the House for her most gracious speech that day to both Houses of Parliament, and for communicating to this House the articles of Union, and the act of Parliament in Scotland 1706-7. for ratification thereof." Which address being presented by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Queen answered, " That she was well pleased, that what she had done was so much to the satisfaction of that House."

The treaty of Union, and the proceedings relating to the same, having been likewise communicated to the House of Peers, their Lordships, upon the Archbishop of Canterbury's motion, ordered a bill to be brought in for the security of the Church of England; which being read a second time on the 3d of February (the Queen and Prince being present) a question was put, " Whether it should be an instruction, by the leave of the House, to insert in the bill the act made 25 Car. II, intitled, An act for the preventing dangers, which may happen from Popish Recusants." Which was resolved in the negative, by a majority of sixty three voices against thirty-three. After which their Lordships went through the bill, by which all acts, passed in favour of the Church, were declared to be in full force for ever; and this was made a fundamental and essential part of the Union. Some exceptions were taken to the words of the bill, as not so strong as the act passed in Scotland seemed to be, since the Government of the Church was not declared to be unalterable; but they were judged more proper, since, where a supreme Legislature is once acknowledged, nothing can be unalterable. This bill had a quick passage through both Houses, and received the Royal assent (1).

On the 4th of February, the Commons, in a Debate in Committee of the whole House, considered of the articles of Union, and act of ratification of the Parliament of Scotland; and, Mr. Compton, being chosen Chairman, Mr. Charles Caesar opened the debate, and raised some objections against the Union. He was seconded by Sir John Packington, who made a speech, importing, " That the business of the Union, that was now before them, being of the highest importance, required therefore the most deliberate consideration. That, with relation thereto, people without doors had been, for a long time, tongue-tied by a special order of Council; which not reaching them within these walls, he would very freely impart his thoughts about it. That, for his own part, he was absolutely against this Incorporating Union, which, he said, was like marrying a woman against her consent; an Union, that was carried on by corruption and bribery within doors, by force and violence without." Many Members taking offence at this bold expression, which highly reflected

(1) Dr. Calamy has the following observation on this act: The thus confirming the act of Uniformity, and the Ecclesiastical Constitution here in England, in all particulars, upon the present foot, for perpetuity, was reckoned by the Dissenters to make their way the clearer, since all hopes of a further Reformation of the Constitution (of which there is so much need) were hereby taken away. The old Puritans many of them fell in with the Established Church, in hope of that way contributing to a farther Reformation: And they, that adhere to their principles, have, since the Restoration, been often pressed to imitate their example, and fall in with the Established Church, with that view; and some worthy persons actually have done it: But the Government by this settlement of all things in the Church as they were to perpetuity, and embodying this settlement with the Union, and making it a fundamental part of it, has quite silenced that plea, and made it as senseless to urge it, as it would be weak to regard it. So that henceforward all, that are convinced, that a farther Reformation is needful, and that it is their duty in their places to pursue it, are bound in conscience to keep at a distance from that Church, which has (as much as in it lies) barred all avenues of farther light, and determined by a law, that it will be, as it is, for ever.

(1) Some

1706-7. Affected both on her Majesty's Ministers, and the Scots Commissioners and Parliament, Sir John Packington said, "He was told, that in Scotland they said, the Union was carried on by bribery and force": Adding, "That the promoters thereof, in thus basely giving up their independent Constitution, had actually betrayed the trust reposed in them; and therefore he would leave it to the judgment of the House to consider, whether, or no, men of such principles were fit to be admitted to sit amongst them? That, among the many inconveniences and irreconcilable contradictions this Union was liable to, he would only take notice of this material one, viz. that her Majesty, by the Coronation-Oath, was obliged to maintain the Church of England, as by law established; and bound likewise by the same oath, to defend the Presbyterian Kirk of Scotland in one and the same Kingdom. Now, said he, after this Union is in force, who shall administer this oath to her Majesty? It is not the business of the Scots, who are incapable of it, and no well withers to the Church of England. It is then only the part of the Bishops to do it. And can it be supposed those Reverend persons will, or can, act a thing so contrary to their own Order and Institution, as thus to promote the Establishment of the Presbyterian Church-Government in the united Kingdom?" He urged likewise, "That, the Church of England being established Jure Divino, and the Scots pretending, that their Kirk was also Jure Divino, he could not tell how two Nations, that clashed in so essential a point, could unite: And therefore he thought it proper to consult the Convocation about this critical point." Colonel Henry Mordaunt, in opposition to Sir John Packington, said, "That he knew of no other Jure Divino but God Almighty's permission: In which sense it might be said, that the Church of England, and the Kirk of Scotland, were both Jure Divino; because God Almighty had permitted, that the first should prevail in England, the other in Scotland: And that the Member, who spoke last, might, if he thought fit, consult the Convocation for his own particular instruction; but that it would be derogatory to the rights of the Commons of England, to advise, on this occasion, with an inferior Assembly, who have no share in the Legislature." Little was said in answer to this speech, only some Members moved, "That the first article of the treaty, which implies a peremptory agreement to an Incorporating Union, be postponed; and that the House should proceed to the consideration of the terms of that intended Union, contained in the other articles." This motion being rejected by a great majority, several Members of the High-Church party went out of the House; whereupon the first, second, third, and fourth articles of the treaty were read and approved without opposition; and, on the 8th of February, the Commons, in a Committee of the whole House, went through and approved the remaining articles. The only objection raised by the Tory-party on this last occasion was, that the Commons went post-haste in a business of the highest importance: to which it was answered, "That deliberation always suppoeth doubts and difficulties; but, no material objections being offered against any of the articles, there was no room for delays (1.)" However, as the debates about the Union lasted but a few days (for they begun the 4th of February, and the whole treaty was approved the 11th) it was thought the Commons did not interpose delay and consideration enough, suitable to the importance of so great a transaction.

The debates were longer and more solemn in the House of Lords. On the 15th of February (the Queen being present) the Lords having resolved themselves into a Committee of the whole House, and the Bishop of Sarum being called upon by the Earl of Sunderland to take the Chair, the debate on the first article was opened by the Earl of Rocheſter, who acquainted the House, that he had many things to object to several of the articles, and said, "It was all one to him, whether their Lordships would please to receive them now, or when those articles came more properly under their consideration." The Earl of Angleſey moved, "That the first article might be postponed, it being impossible for him to give his vote to it, before he knew, and was thoroughly satisfied, wherein this Union was to consist." Several others were of that opinion, among whom the Bishop of Bath and Wells spoke much to the same effect. The Earl of Nottingham excepted against the name of Great-Britain, alledging, that it was such an innovation in the Monarchy, as totally subverted all the laws of England; and therefore moved, That the Judges opinions might be asked about it; and he was seconded by several other Members. Hereupon the Judges, being severally asked their opinions in that respect, unanimously declared, "They could not conceive, that in any ways altered or impaired the Constitution of this Realm, whose laws, in their opinion, must remain intirely the same, as well after, as before the Union, except such as were altogether inconsistent with, and directly contrary thereto." The Lord Haverſham, who, of late years, had made himself famous by his set speeches on several occasions, could not be silent on this, and therefore spoke as follows:

My Lords,

"WHAT my noble Lord (Rocheſter) has mentioned to your Lordships, occasions my standing up. I find myself under the same difficulties. I have several things to say to this matter of the Union to your ships, and it is very indifferent to me, when I offer them. I have a right of speaking my thoughts, and entering my protest too, to any thing I dislike; and I shall certainly find some

(1) Some Members of that party still crying out, Poste-haste, poste-haste, Sir Thomas Littleton pursued the simile, and said, "They did not ride post, but a good easy trot; and, for his own part, as long as the "weather was fair, the roads good, and their horses in heart, he was of opinion, they ought to jog on, and not take up, till they got home."

1706-7. "some time to do so, before this matter can pass into a law. I am in your Lordships judgment, whether you will allow me to speak, what I have to say, now.

"My Lords, with what disposition I come hither, I hope may be evidenced by the motion, I made your Lordships last year, for repealing certain clauses, that were grievous to Scotland. I would do any thing, that were for the benefit and good of both Nations.

"These articles come to your Lordships with the greatest countenance of authority, that, I think, it is possible any thing can come. Your Commissioners have agreed to them; the Scots Parliament has, with some few amendments, ratified them, and the Queen herself from the Throne approves of them. And yet, you must give me leave to say, that authority, though it be the strongest motive to incline the will, is the weakest argument in all the world to convince the understanding. It is the argument the Church of Rome makes use of for their superstitious worship, where there are ten Ave Maria's to one Pater Noster; just as unreasonable, as if ten times the application and address were made to a she-favourite, as to the person of the Sovereign, which is a kind of State-Idolatry.

"I would not, my Lords, be misunderstood, as if I were against an Union. A federal Union, an Union of interest, an Union in Succession, is what I shall be always for. Nay, were it, whether a people inhabiting the same island, speaking the same language, and having the same Religion, should be all under one and the same form of policy and Government, I cannot see how any man could be against it. But this is a matter of a quite different nature: It is, whether two Nations independent in their Sovereignties, that have their distinct laws and interests, and what I cannot forget, their different forms of worship, Church-government, and order, shall be united into one Kingdom. An Union made up, in my opinion, of so many mismatched pieces, of such jarring, incongruous ingredients, that, should it ever take effect, I fear it would carry the necessary consequence of a standing power and force, to keep us from falling asunder, and breaking in pieces every moment. For, as my Lord Bacon well observes (whom I take to be a very great man, though sometimes the Courtier got the better of the Philosopher) an Unity, says he, that is pieced up by a direct admission of contraries in the fundamental points of it, is like the toes of Nebuchadnezzar's image, which were made of iron and clay; they may cleave together, but can never incorporate.

"Another reason, why I am against an incorporating Union, is, for the sake of the good old English constitution, justly allowed to be the most equal and best-poized Government in all the world, the peculiar excellency of which lies in that well-proportioned distribution of powers, whereby the greatness of the Monarch, and the safety of the people, are at once provided for; and it is a maxim in all policy, that the surest way to preserve any Government is by a strict adherence to its principles. So that, whilst this balance of power is kept equal, the constitution is safe;

"but who can answer what alteration so great a weight, as sixty one Scots Members, and those too returned by a Scots Privy-Council, when thrown into the balance, may make?

"Besides, my Lords, I must own I am apprehensive of the precedent, and know not how far it may be carried hereafter, or what alteration future Parliaments may think fit to make. It is evident by the two and twentieth article, that above an hundred Scots Peers, and as many Commoners, are excluded from sitting and voting in the British Parliament, who perhaps as little thought of being so a year or two ago, as any of your Lordships do now; for they had as much right by inheritance of sitting there, as any one Lord in this House has of sitting here; and that right too as well and as strongly fenced and secured to them by the fundamental laws of their Kingdom, by claim of right, and act of Parliament, which made it treason to make any alteration in the constitution of that Kingdom; and yet have not they lost their privilege? And what one security has any Peer of England, by the laws of this land, to his right and privilege of Peerage, that those Lords had not? My Lords the Bishops have been once voted out of this House by the Temporal Lords already; and who knows what question may come hereafter? I will venture my life in defence of the Church of England; and yet at the same time own myself an Occasional Conformist. But if my Lords the Bishops will weaken their own cause, so far as to give up the two great points of Episcopal ordination and Confirmation; if they will approve and ratify the act for securing the Presbyterian Church-government in Scotland, as the true Protestant Religion and Purity of Worship; they give up that, which has been contended for between them and the Presbyterians this thirty years, and, which I will undertake to prove to my Lords the Bishops, has been defended by the greatest and learnedest men in the Church of England. I hope, when it is proper, my Lords will please to give some light to one, who desires instruction, that I may not ignorantly do any thing to their prejudice in this matter.

"There is another reason, why I am against this Union, because I cannot think it an intire Union. The exempting articles, I mean the twentieth article, whereby heritable offices and superiorities are reserved; and also the one and twentieth; both which Oliver, by an act of State, was so wise as to abolish; especially their act for securing their Presbyterian Church-Government and General Assemblies, seem to me like those little clouds, in a warm calm summer's day, that are generally the seeds and attractives of approaching tempest and thunder. I the rather take notice of these, because, though the articles of Union are ratified by the Scots Parliament, yet the bulk and body of that Nation seem to be against them. Have not the murmurs of the people there been so loud, as to fill the whole Nation? And so bold too, as to reach even to the doors of the Parliament? Has not the Parliament itself thought fit to suspend their beloved clause in the act of Security, for arming their people during the Session? Nay, Has not the Government, by advice of Parli-1706-7. "liament, set out a proclamation, which I have here in my own hand, pardoning all slaughter, blood-shed, maiming, &c. that is committed upon any, who are found in any tumults there, and discharging all prosecution for the future? I do not mention this to find fault with any thing, that is done in Scotland, but only to shew to your Lordships, that when such an unusual proclamation as this is set out by advice of Parliament, and cannot stay the forms of a law; when we know, that, upon extraordinary occasions, a bill may be read three times in one day; sure, my Lords, it shews a very great ferment, that requires so very speedy an application. After all, has not what we desire, I mean their being upon the same foot of Succession with us, been offered without this Union? In short, my Lords, I think an incorporating Union one of the most dangerous experiments to both Nations; in which, if we happen to be mistaken, however we may think of curing things hereafter, the error is irretrievable.

ment,

"My Lords, this is the last time, that I believe I shall ever trouble your Lordships in an English Parliament: Give me leave therefore to say but one word.

"In King Charles the First's time the Cavaliers were the persons, that ventured their lives, and lost their estates to save him. And, in King Charles the Second's time, they were forgot, and left starving. At the Restoration the Presbyterians were as zealous for that as any men whatever, and none more persecuted all his Reign. Towards the latter end of that Reign, the Bishops threw out the bill of exclusion, and King James put them into the Tower. At the Revolution, the Londonderry men, &c. were the persons, that made the first and noblest stop to King James in Ireland; and I myself have fed some of them at my own table, when they were starving with the greatest commendations and promises in their pockets, which I have seen under King William's own hand. In the last Reign every body knows, who they were, that made their most constant Court at St. James's; and we see in what favour they are in at this present.

"Now there is a great deal of zeal for this Union. I wish, from my zeal, that the advantages may attend it of tranquillity and security, power, peace, and plenty, as is intended by it. But yet it is possible men may be mistaken. I will not say they will ever repent of it; but I will take leave to say what I have formerly said in this place, That what has been, may be."

It may here be observed, that to all the objections, that were offered against the Union, this general answer was made, that so great a thing, as the uniting the whole island into one Government, could not be compassed but with some inconveniencies: But, if the advantage of Safety and Union was greater than those inconveniencies, then a lesser evil must be submitted to.

The debate being over, the question was put, Whether the consideration of the first article of the treaty of Union should be postponed till after the other articles had been examined? But it was carried in the negative by a majority of twenty-two voices against twenty-two; and so the first six articles were read and approved, and the consideration of the rest adjourned to the 19th of February, when the Lord North and Grey observed, with relation to the ninth article, "the small and unequal proportion, which Scotland was to pay to the land-tax; urging, that Wales, as poor a country every whit as that, and of a much less extent, paid to the full as much again, and yet sent not much more than half the number of Representatives in Parliament, which were granted to Scotland; and, for that reason, his Lordship said he could not agree to this article." He was answered by the Lord Hallifax, "That the number of Representatives was no rule to go by, since there was the County of Cornwall in England, that paid not near so much towards the land-tax as that of Gloucester, and yet sent almost five times as many Members to Parliament as the other did. That it was very true, the quota of Scotland was very small and unequal, in comparison to what was paid in England; but that the English Commissioners could not induce the Scots ones to agree to any more, upon account of several impossibilities on their side. That we could not expect to reap the like advantages of every article of the treaty; and that, if they had the better of us in some few, we were infinitely recompensed by the many advantages, which did accrue to us from the whole." Here again the House divided on this article, there being seventy for it, and twenty-three against it; and so, having run over the four following articles, the consideration of the rest was further adjourned to the 21st of February, when (the Queen being present) the debate chiefly ran upon the fifteenth article. The Earl of Nottingham observed, that it consisted of two parts, a certain grant of money, and the application thereof, in reference to which he said, "That it was highly unreasonable, that the Scots, who were by the treaty let into all the branches of our trade, and paid so little towards the support of the Government, and of a most expensive and bloody war, should moreover have an Equivalent of three-hundred ninety-eight thousand and eighty five pounds given them for coming into this treaty. His Lordship insisted much upon that argument, and took notice, as to the disposal of this Equivalent, that part of it, which was to be given to the Darien Company, was so ordered, as that it might be swallowed up by a few persons, without any particular regard to the indemnifying every private sufferer in that unhappy enterprise." The Lord Hallifax answered, "That this Equivalent could not be looked upon as a gift, but as an actual purchase of the Scots Revenue and Customs, which, by this Union, were to be applied to the payment of the debts of England; and that they were so more gainers by it, than the English were by the sale of Annuities at fifteen or sixteen years purchase. That, as to the disposal of the money, it being their own, it was but reasonable they should have the liberty of applying the same, as they thought most convenient, the English Commissioners being no ways concerned therein, whose care, nevertheless, and great pru-

1706-7. "dence had been such, that they made provision it should not be disposed of but by certain Commissioners, who should be accountable for the same to the Parliament of Great-Britain." Then their Lordships proceeded as far as the nineteenth article, and so adjourned to the 24th of February, when (the Queen being likewise present) the Lord Thanes, on the twentieth article, acquainted their Lordships, "That, himself having an Heritable Office here in England, by being perpetual Sheriff of the County of Wiltshire, he should be glad, with their Lordships leave, to have the opinion of the Judges about the preservation of that his right, there being no provision made in this article for Heritable Offices in England." The Lord Chamberlain seconded him in that motion, saying, "He had the honour likewise of having such an Heritable Office, about the preservation whereof he had the very same doubts and scruples with the noble Peer, who spoke last." Whereupon it was agreed, that the Judges should deliver their opinion about it, which they did, and their answers were much the same with what they had declared to the House to be their opinion with respect to the first article.

The Earl of Rocheſter, after reading the twenty-second article, declared, "That he looked upon it as incongruous, contradictory to, and inconsistent with itself. That there were sixteen Peers to be returned to the House of Lords, in the Parliament of Great Britain, who were Peers and no Peers. That, being all Peers by Right of Inheritance, they were, nevertheless, made here elective, which he took to be wresting them of their Peerage; because, not being sure of being always elected to every Parliament of Great-Britain, they consequently must lose, when left out, the benefit of sitting in Parliament, which was ever deemed an inseparable right of the Peerage. That the rest of the nobility of Scotland, to the number of above a hundred, were thereby manifestly injured; and that, for his part, he wondered very much, how the Scots came to accept of such unreasonable conditions; or how their Lordships could entertain the thoughts of permitting such Peers by election to sit among them." The Lords Nottingham, North and Grey, and Guernsey very much enforced this topic, adding, "That, as one might very well suppose, that those Scots Peers would be such, as were addicted to the Kirk, it might prove of dangerous consequence to the Church of England." The Earl of Wearion replied, "That, though they were all never so much of the Kirk party, yet there was no reason to fear, but they would also be very well disposed for the Church of England, and stand up in its defence on all occasions, since there were even some sitting amongst their Lordships, who would venture their lives for the Church of England, and yet openly declared themselves to be at the same time Occasional Conformists." The Lord Haversham, rightly judging, that he was hinted at by the Earl, stood up to inform the House, what he understood by an Occasional Conformist, in which explanation he appeared somewhat embarrassed; for after having made a long encomium on the Episcopal Order, which he took to be the best and most conformable to Primitive

Christianity, he gave no less commendations to all the Protestant Churches abroad, and to the Kirk of Scotland itself in particular, which, he said, was a true Protestant Church." The Bishop of Bath and Wells declared, "That, for his part, he was altogether against this Union, though he could wish with all his heart it had been completed an hundred years ago, because all the ferment and discords, which now were likely to issue upon it, would, by this time, have had their course. That he could no better compare it, than to the mixing together strong liquors of a contrary nature in one and the same vessel, which would go on being burst asunder by their furious fermentation: That their bench was always reckoned the dead weight of the House; but that the sixteen Scots Peers, being admitted to sit therein, would more effectually be so, especially in any future debates relating to the Church, towards which they could no ways be supposed to be well-affected; and therefore he was humbly of opinion, that some provision might be made for debarring them of their votes in any Church-matter, that should hereafter come in agitation." To all this, and much more that was alleged on account of the danger of the Church, when so many votes of persons tied to Presbytery were admitted to a share in the Legislature, it was answered by the Lords Sommers, Hallifax, and others, that the chief danger, the Church was in, were from France and from Popery: So that whatsoever secured us from these, delivered us from our justest fears. Scotland lay on the weakest side of England, where it could not be defended, but by an army: The coaleries on the Tyne lay exposed for several miles, and could not be preserved, but at a great charge, and with a great force: If a war should fall out between the two Nations, and if Scotland should be conquered, yet, even in that case, it must be united to England, or kept under by an army: The danger of keeping up a standing force, in the hands of any Prince, and to be modelled by him (who might engage the Scots to join with that army and turn upon England) was visible: And any Union, after such a conquest, would look like a force, and so could not be lasting; whereas all now was voluntary. As for Church-matters, there had been such violence used by all sides in their turns, that none of them could reproach the others much, without having it returned upon them too justly. A softer management would lay those heats, and bring men to a better temper: the Canons of Switzerland, though very zealous in their different religions, yet were united in one general body: The Diet of Germany was composed of men of three different Religions: So that several Constitutions of Churches might be put under one Legislature; and, if there was a danger of either side, it was much more likely that five hundred and thirteen would be too hard for forty-five, than that forty-five would master five hundred and thirteen; especially when the Crown was on their side: And there were twenty-six Bishops in the House of Lords, to outweigh the sixteen votes from Scotland. The debate being over, the twenty-second article was approved by a majority of seventy-one votes against twenty-two; and then the remaining articles were likewise approved. Upon the reading the last, the Earl of Abingdon moved, that the Judges opinion

1706-7. opinion might be asked, what laws would be repealed by this Union, and what would remain in force; but that motion was rejected. Then the Earl of Nottingham stood up, and begged their Lordships pardon "for having troubled them almost to every article, excusing himself, however, by urging, that they were such material objections occurring to him, as in conscience he thought himself obliged to lay before the House. That as Sir John Maynard made this compliment to the late King at the Revolution, That, having buried, upon account of his great age, all his Contemporaries in Westminster-Hall, he was afraid, if his Majesty had not come in that very juncture of time, he might have likewise outlived the very laws themselves; so, if this Union did pass, as he had no reason to doubt but it would most certainly pass, he might, with as much reason, and as justly affirm, he had outlived all the laws, and the very Constitution of England." Concluding with a prayer to God, "to avert the dire effects, which might probably insue from such an Incorporating Union." Three days after, the Bishop of Sarum reported to the House of Lords the Resolutions of their Grand Committee, ap-^{1706-7.} proving the treaty of Union, which were agreed to by a great Majority; but several Peers entered their protests, some against all, others, against some of the articles (1).

The several articles of the Union being thus agreed to by both Houses, a bill was ordered to be brought in to enact it, which was prepared by Sir Simon Harcourt, the Solicitor-General, with so particular a contrivance, as to cut off all debates. The preamble was a recital of the articles, as they were passed in Scotland, together with the acts made in both Parliaments for the security of their several Churches; and in conclusion there came one enacting clause, ratifying all. This put those upon great difficulties, who had resolved to object to several articles, and to insist on demanding some alterations in them: They could not object to the recital, it being merely matter of fact; and they had not strength enough to oppose the general enacting clause; nor was it easy to come at particulars, and to offer proviso's relating to them. The matter was carried on with such zeal, that it passed the House of Commons, before those who intended

(1) They were as follow:

We dissent to every one of the twenty-five resolutions.

Granville, Haverham, Stawell.

I dissent to the four last resolutions, having not been present at the passing the others.

Geo. Bath and Wells.

I dissent to every one of the twenty-five resolutions, except the second.

Beaufort.

I dissent to the first, fourth, fifth, sixth, ninth, fifteenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-fifth resolutions.

Abingdon.

Dissentient To the ninth Resolution.

Because we humbly conceive the sum of forty-eight thousand pounds, to be charged on the Kingdom of Scotland, as the quota of Scotland, for a land-tax, is not proportionable to the four shillings aid granted by the Parliament of England; but if, by reason of the present circumstances of the Kingdom, it might have been thought it was not to bear a greater proportion at this time, yet we cannot but think it unequal to this Kingdom, that it should be agreed, that whenever the four shillings aid shall be enacted by the Parliament of Great-Britain, to be raised on land in England, that the forty-eight thousand pounds, now raised on Scotland, shall never be increased in time to come, when the trade of that Kingdom should be extremely improved, and consequently the value of their land proportionably raised, which, in all probability, it must do, when this Union shall have taken effect.

North and Grey, Rochester, Howard, Leigh, Guilford.

Dissentient To the fifteenth Resolution.

Because we humbly conceive nothing could have been more equal on this head of the treaty, than that neither of the Kingdoms should have been burdened with the debts of the other, contracted before the Union; and if that proposal, which we find once made in the minutes of the treaty, had taken place, there would have been an occasion to have employed the Revenues of the Kingdom of Scotland towards the payment of the debts of England; those Revenues might have been strictly appropriated to the debts of the Kingdom, and to any other use within themselves, as should have been judged requisite; and there would have been no need of an Equivalent of very near four hundred thousand pounds to be raised on England, within this year, for the purchase of those Revenues in Scotland, which, however it may prove to be but a reasonable bargain, upon a strict calculation, there does not seem to have been a necessity just now to have raised so great a sum, when this Kingdom is already burdened with so vast ones for necessary charges of the war.

Rochester, North and Grey, Guilford, Leigh.

Dissentient To the twenty-second Resolution.

Because we humbly conceive, in the first place, that the number of sixteen Peers of Scotland is too great a proportion to be added to the Peers of England, who very rarely consist of more than an hundred attending Lords in any one Session of Parliament; and, for that reason, we humbly apprehend, such a number as sixteen may have a very great sway in the resolutions of this House, of which the consequence cannot now be foreseen.

In the second place, we conceive the Lords of Scotland, who, by virtue of this treaty, are to sit in this House, being not qualified as the Peers of England are, must suffer a diminution of their dignity to sit here on so different foundations, their right of sitting here depending intirely on an election, and that from time to time during the continuance of one Parliament only; and, at the same time, we are humbly of opinion, that the Peers of England, who sit here by creation from the Crown, and have a right of so doing in themselves or their heirs by that creation for ever, may find it an alteration in their constitution, to have Lords added to their number, to sit and vote in all matters brought before a Parliament, who have not the same (right) of their seats in Parliament, as the Peers of England have.

Buckingham, North and Grey, Leigh, Rochester, Guilford.

We dissent to the resolution of passing the last article, because, there being no enumeration of what laws are to be repealed, it is conceived too great a latitude of construction thereupon is left to the Judges.

Abingdon, Leigh, North and Grey, Guilford.

(1) On

1706-7. to oppose it had recovered themselves out of the surprize, under which the form, it was drawn in, had put them. The bill was carried there by a majority of two hundred and seventy-four voices against a hundred and sixty, who were for rejecting it (1). The bill was, on the 11th of March, carried by Mr. Spencer Compton to the House of Lords, who gave it a quick dispatch; but, upon the third reading, the Lord North and Grey offered a Rider to be added to it, importing, "That nothing, in this ratification contained, should be construed to extend to an approbation or acknowledgement of the truth of the Presbyterian way of worship, or allowing the Religion of the Church of Scotland to be what it was styled, the true Protestant Religion." After a debate, the question was put, "Whether this Rider should be read a second time, and it was carried in the negative by fifty-five voices against twenty-nine; upon which several Lords entered their dissent (2). Then the question being put, Whether this bill should pass? It was resolved in the affirmative by a great majority; but several Peers entered their protests against it (3).

When the Queen came to the House of Lords to pass the Union-bill, she made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Queen's speech on passing the Union-bill.

"I T is with the greatest satisfaction, that I have given my assent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one Kingdom. "I consider this Union as a matter of the greatest importance to the wealth, strength, and safety of the whole Island; and, at the same time, as a work of so much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that till now all attempts, which have been made towards it, in the course of above a hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt, but it will be remembered and spoke of hereafter, to the honour of those,

"who have been instrumental in bringing it to 1706-7. such a happy conclusion.

"I desire and expect from all my subjects of both Nations, that from henceforth they act with all possible respect and kindness to one another, that so it may appear to all the world, they have hearts disposed to become one people.

"This will be a great pleasure to me, and will make us all quickly sensible of the good effects of this Union.

"And I cannot but look upon it as a peculiar happiness, that in my Reign so full provision is made for the peace and quiet of my People, and for the security of our Religion, by so firm an establishment of the Protestant Succession throughout Great-Britain.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I take this occasion to remind you of making effectual provision for the payment of the Equivalent to Scotland, within the time appointed by the act; and I am persuaded, you will shew as much readiness in this particular, as you have done in all the parts of this great work.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The season of the year being now pretty far advanced, I hope you will continue the same zeal, which has appeared throughout this Session, in dispatching what yet remains unfinished of the public business before you."

Thus this great design, so long wished and laboured for in vain, was begun and happily ended within the compass of nine months. The Union was to commence on the 11th of May, and, till that time, the two Kingdoms were still distinct, and their two Parliaments continued to sit.

The act of Union was no sooner passed, but Ill use of an the 4th and 6th articles of the Union prevented.

(1) On the 22^d of February, upon Mr. Bromley's motion, the Commons ordered, "That it be an instruction to the Committee of the whole House, to whom the bill for an Union between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland was committed, that they might receive a clause, that the two Universities of this Kingdom might continue for ever, as they now are by law established." But a motion being made, and the question put, "That it be another instruction to the Committee, that they might receive a clause to make the like provision, that the subjects of this Kingdom should be for ever free of any oath, test, or subscription within this Kingdom, contrary to, or inconsistent with, the true Protestant Religion, Government, Worship, and Discipline of the Church of England, as now by law established, as was already provided for the subjects of Scotland, with respect to their Presbyterian Government;" it passed in the negative. The same day Sir Roger Molyneux moved, that a clause should be inserted in the said bill, in favour of the Convocation of the Clergy, as part of the Constitution; which assertion and motion were both exploded. But, the Parliament of Scotland having inserted in the articles of Union several clauses for draw-backs and allowances upon divers commodities of the growth of that Kingdom, which might put the English traders upon an unequal foot with the Scots; the Commons of England took that matter into their consideration; and, in a Committee of the whole House came to several resolutions for allowing draw-backs on English salt, white herrings, beef, pork, oatmeal, and grain, called Bear alias Big, exported from England and Wales: Which resolutions were, on the 27th of February, reported to the House, agreed to, and a bill ordered to be brought in, which received the Royal assent.

(2) Dissentient

Beaufort, Buckingham, North and Grey, Anglesea, Winchelsea, Northampton, Abingdon, Nottingham, Scarfdale, Geo. Bath, and Wells, Thanet, Granville, Stawell, Guernsey, Weymouth, Guilford, Leigh.

(3) Dissentient

Nottingham, Anglesea, Thanet, Winchelsea, Northampton, Scarfdale, Weymouth, Guernsey.

Because the constitution of this Kingdom has been so very excellent, and therefore justly applauded by all our neighbours, for so many ages, that we cannot conceive it prudent now to change it, and to venture at all those alterations made by this bill, some of them especially being of such a nature, that, as the inconvenience and danger of them (in our humble opinion) is already but too obvious, we think it more proper and decent to avoid entering further into the particular apprehension we have from the passing of this law.

Beaufort, Buckingham, Stawell, Guilford, Granville, Leigh.

1706-7. an ill use was intended to be made of it. The Customs of Scotland were then in a farm, and the Farmers were the creatures of the Ministry, some of whom, as was believed, were sharers with them: It was visible, that, since there was to be a free trade opened, between Scotland and England, after the first of May, and since the duties in Scotland, laid on trade, were much lower than in England, that there would be a great importation into Scotland, on the prospect of the advantage, that might be made by sending it into England. Upon such an emergency, it was reasonable to break the farm, as had been ordinarily done upon less reason, and to take the Customs into a new management, that so the gain, to be made in the interval, might go to the publick, and not be left in private hands: But the lease was continued in favour of the Farmers. They were men of no interest of their own, so it was not doubted, but that there was a secret practice in the case. Upon the view of the gain, to be made by such an importation, it was understood, that orders were sent to Holland, and other places, to buy up wine, brandy, and other merchandize. And another notorious fraud was designed by some in England; who, because of the great draw-back that was allowed for tobacco and other plantation commodities, when exported, were sending great quantities to Scotland, on design to bring them back after the first of May, that so they might sell them free of that duty. A bill was therefore offered to the Commons, for preventing these fraudulent practices. When this bill was read the third time, Mr. Secretary Harley proposed the adding another clause, namely, that all goods, that were carried into Scotland after the first of February (unless it were by the natural-born subjects of that Kingdom inhabiting in it) in case they were imported into England after the first of May, should be liable to the English duties; and of this, the proof was to lie on the Importer: This angered all the Scots, who raised a great clamour upon it, and said, the Union was broke by it; and that such a proceeding would have very ill effects in Scotland. But the House of Commons were so alarmed with the news of a vast importation, which was aggravated far beyond the truth, and by which they concluded, that the trade of England would greatly suffer, at least for a year or two, that they passed the bill, and sent it to the Lords, where it was rejected; for it appeared plainly to them, that this was an infraction of some of the articles of the treaty. It was suggested, that a recess for some days was necessary, that so the Commons might have an opportunity to prepare a bill, prohibiting all goods from being brought to England, that had been sent out, only in order that the Merchants might have the draw-back allowed. Accordingly, the Queen came to the House of Peers on the 8th of April, and prorogued the Parliament to the 14th of that month.

Petition
of the Merchants against importing goods into Scotland.
Fr. H. C.
IV. 68.

The Parliament being met again on that day, the Queen came to the House of Lords, and made a short speech to both Houses, importing, "That she was willing to give them an opportunity of coming together again, to consider, if any thing could properly be done to prevent the inconveniencies, that might happen to trade, by too great an interval between 1707.

"the rising of the Parliament and the first of May; and that she need not add, that what"ever was to be done of that kind, would re"quire to be dispatched in a little time." The Commons, who were more inflamed than be"fore, being returned to their House, received and read a petition of the Merchants concerned in the importation of wines and brandy from Spain, Portugal, and Italy, and of other goods from Holland, &c. complaining, "That great "quantities of French wines, brandies, silks, "prunes, rosin, &c. of the growth and pro"duct of France; whalebone, linen, drugs,
"coffee, spices, &c. from Holland and from "France; were directly brought, and more in"tended to be imported into the Kingdom of "Scotland, in order to be brought thence and "imported into England, after the first of May,
"to avoid the English duties, to the great de"triment and loss of some, and the utter ruin
"of others, who had imported, and were im"porting into England the like commodities
"from Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Holland, "paying the high duties upon them; which "commodities had been chiefly purchased abroad
"with the woollen manufactures, corn, and other "products of England; and praying, that the "House would prevent the importation of these "goods, which would be a great damage, not "only to the Petitioners, but to her Majesty's "Customs; or otherwise so to provide for the "Petitioners relief, as the House should think "fit. The next day the Commons, in a Com"mittee of the whole House, resolved, first, "That ^{Resolution}
"the importation of goods and merchandizes of ^{thereon}
"the growth and produce of France, and other "foreign parts, into Scotland, in order to be "brought from thence into England, after the "first of May, and with intention to avoid the "payment of the English duties, would be to "the damage and ruin of fair traders, to the "prejudice of the manufactures of England, a "great loss to her Majesty's revenue of the cus"toms, and a very great detriment to the pub"lick. Secondly, That the exporting of goods "and merchandizes from England into Scotland,
"that are intitled to a draw-back, with intention
"to bring the same back again into England af"ter the first of May, was a most notorious "fraud, to the damage and ruin of fair traders,
"to the great loss of her Majesty's revenues of "the Customs, and a very great detriment to the "publick." These resolutions being immediately reported and agreed to, a bill was ordered to be brought in upon the same; which, being passed, was sent to the Lords for their concurrence.
But it being apprehended, that this law would give offence to the Scots; and the most eminent Lawyers, who were consulted about it, not agreeing in their opinions, the Court thought fit to let it fall; the rather, because the first of May was near at hand, and that the practices of the fraudulent Traders had, in great measure, been prevented by the terror of the intended law, and the clause offered by Mr. Harley. And, therefore, the Queen came to the House of Peers on the 24th of April, and made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The Speech to both Houses.
April 24.
Pr. H. C.
IV. 70.

"I Return you my hearty thanks for the great zeal and affection, which you have shewn for my service and the publick good, in the several affairs, which have been before you, especially in that of the Union of Scotland, which, I doubt not, will prove a lasting blessing to this Island.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I am to thank you in particular for the great dispatch you have made, in providing the largest and most effectual Supplies, that have ever been given to the Crown for the current service, in any one Session of Parliament. I am very much concerned, that the publick occasions require the raising of such great sums from my people. I will take care they shall be applied to the uses, for which they are given; and I hope, by God's blessing, we may obtain advantages from them, answerable to so great an expence.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It is proper for me, before we part, to communicate to you, that I think it expedient, that the Lords of Parliament of England, and Commons of the present Parliament of England, should be the Members of the respective Houses of the first Parliament of Great-Britain, for, and on the part of England; and therefore I intend, within the time limited, to publish a proclamation for that purpose, pursuant to the power given me by the acts of Parliaments of both Kingdoms, ratifying the treaty of Union. And, after we have so fully compleated this great work, I assure myself, that, when you return to your several Countries, you will omit no opportunity of making my subjects sensible of the security, and the other great and lasting benefits, they may reasonably expect from this happy Union.

"This will conduce very much to make it prove so, and be a good preparation to the success of our next meeting; when, I hope, we shall all join our sincere and hearty endeavours to promote the welfare and prosperity of Great-Britain."

After this speech, the Lord-Keeper prorogued the Parliament to the 30th of April 1707.

Remarks on the Union.
Burnet.

Thus this remarkable Session came to a happy conclusion, after having finished the great transaction of the Union, on which it may not be improper to make the following observations. It is certain, the design on Darien the great charge it put Scotland to, and the total miscarriage of that project, made the trading part of that Kingdom see the impossibility of undertaking any great design in trade; and this made them the more ready to concur in carrying on the Union. The wiser men of that Nation had observed long, that Scotland lay at the mercy of the Ministry, and that every new set of Ministers made use of their power to enrich themselves and their creatures at the cost of the publick; that the Judges being made by them were in such a dependance, that, since there are no Juries allowed in Scotland in civil matters, the whole property of the Kingdom was in their hands, and by their means in the hands of the Ministers. They had also observed, how ineffectual it had been to complain of them at Court. It put those, who ventured on it, to a vast charge, to no other purpose, but to expose them the more to the fury of the Ministry. The poor Noblemen and the poor Boroughs made a great majority in their Parliament, and were easily to be purchased by the Court. They saw therefore no hopes of a remedy for such a mischief, but by an Incorporating Union with England. These thoughts were much quickened, by the prospect of recovering what they had lost in that ill-concerted undertaking of Darien; and this was so universal and so operative, that the design on Darien, which the Jacobites had set on foot and prosecuted with so much fury, and with bad intentions, did now engage many to promote the Union, who, without that consideration, would have been at least neutral, if not backward in it. The Court was engaged to promote the Union, on account of the act of Security passed in the year 1704, which was imputed chiefly to the Lord-Treasurer. Threatenings of impeaching him for advising it had often been let fall; and, upon that, his enemies had set their chief hopes of overthrowing him; for, though no proof could be brought of his counsel in it, yet it was not doubted, but that his advice had determined the Queen to pass it. An impeachment was a word of an odious sound, which would engage a party against him, and disorder a Session of Parliament; and the least ill effect it might have, would be to oblige him to withdraw from business, which was chiefly aimed at. The Queen was very sensible, that his managing the great trust he was in, in the manner he did, made all the rest of her Government both safe and easy to her; and therefore she spared no pains to bring this about, and it was believed she was at no small cost to compass it; for those of Scotland had learned from England to set a price upon their votes, and expected to be well paid for them. The Lord-Treasurer likewise exerted himself in this matter with an activity and zeal, that seemed not to be in his nature; and indeed, all the application, with which the Court pursued this affair, was necessary to master the opposition and difficulties, which sprang up in the progress of it. That, which compleated all, was the low state, to which the affairs of France were reduced. That Kingdom could spare neither men nor money to support their party, which otherwise they would undoubtedly have done. They had, in imitation of the Exchequer notes here in England, given out Mint-Bills to a great value; some said two hundred millions of livres. These were ordered to be taken by the subjects in all payments, as money to the full value, but were not to be received in payments of the King's Taxes. This put them under a great discredit, and the fund created for repaying them, not being thought a good one, they had sunk seventy per cent. This occasioned an inexpressible disorder in all payments, and in the whole commerce of France. All the Methods, that were proposed for raising their credit, had proved ineffectual;

1707. ineffectual; for they remained, after all, at the discount of fifty-eight per cent. A Court, in this distress, was not in a condition to spare much to support such an inconsiderable interest, as they esteemed their party in Scotland; who therefore had not the assistance, which they promised themselves from thence. The conjuncture of these various incidents, which brought this great work to a happy conclusion, was so remarkable, that the laying them all in one view will, it is hoped, not be thought an impertinent digression.

The Parliament reviewed by proclamation.

The Parliament being at an end, the Queen, by virtue of a clause in the act of Union, and pursuant to her promise in her speech, revived it by a proclamation of the 29th of April, and, by another of June 5, declared her pleasure for holding the first Parliament of Great-Britain on the 23d of October. Upon this, many of the Scotch Lords came to London, and were very well received. Montrose and Roxburgh were made Dukes in Scotland; some of them were made Privy-Counsellors in England; and a Commission, for a new Council, was sent to Scotland: There appeared soon two different parties among the Scotch; some of them moved, that there should neither be a distinct Government, nor a Privy-Council continued there, but that all should be brought under one Administration, as the several Counties in England were; they said, the sooner all were consolidated, in all respects, into one body, the possibility of separating and disuniting them would be the sooner extinguished; this was pressed with the most earnestness by those, who were weary of the present Ministry, and longed to see their power at an end: But the Ministry, who had a mind to keep up their authority, said, there was a necessity of preserving a shew of Greatness, and a form of Government in those parts, both for subduing the Jacobites, and that the Nation might not be disgusted, by too sudden an alteration of outward appearances. The Court resolved to maintain the Ministry there, till the next Session of Parliament, in which new measures might be taken. Thus affairs were happily settled at home, and the first of May, when the Union took place, being appointed to be observed as a day of publick and general thanksgiving for the happy conclusion of the treaty of Union, it was celebrated with a decent solemnity. Congratulatory addresses on account of the Union were presented to the Queen from all parts of the Kingdom. But it was observed, that the University of Oxford were silent on this occasion, as well as the Scots, which made the Addressers of Brackley in Northamptonshire suggest, "That after the little notice, that had hitherto been taken of the Union by those, who enjoyed the greatest share of it, at least an equivalent of the advantage, they had some thoughts of not disturbing her Majesty at this time, in her great concerns for the liberties of all Europe, had they not been afraid, lest the malice of the world should have unjustly tacked them to some of her Majesty's mistaken subjects, who, by their silence, in not addressing, had sufficiently declared their dislike of what her Majesty had owned her greatest pleasure and satisfaction." (1)

About

(1) That the proceedings in the affair of the Union might not be interrupted, the following particulars, which happened during this Session, were purposely omitted.

The House of Commons addressed the Queen about resettling the islands of Nevis and St. Christophers, which had suffered much by the French. The French came from Martinico with five men of war and twenty sloops to St. Christophers, and made a descent in March 1706; being repelled in their attack of the castle, they fell in among the plantations, some of which they burnt, and plundered the inhabitants; but the Governour of Barbadoes, upon notice of it, sent down a sloop to the Governour of St. Christophers, to acquaint him there was a strong squadron of English men of war coming to his assistance; which news being conveyed to the French had the intended effect, for they no sooner heard of it, than they quitted the island, taking away with them about three hundred Negroes. From thence they went to Nevis, where they landed their troops, and the inhabitants being over-powered by numbers retired to the mountains; the enemy, marching thither too, attacks them; they beat a parley, and a capitulation was concluded the next day, March 24, by which they were to be prisoners of war, but to remain in the island, and procuring a like number of French prisoners, to be released by way of exchange, either in America or Europe; and, in the mean time, they were to be civilly used, and their houses and sugar-works preserved; but the French broke the capitulation in several respects, treating them most barbarously, and burning their houses and sugar-works, and by threats and ill usage forced many of them to form a second agreement the 6th of April, promising the enemy in six months time to send to Martinico a certain number of Negroes, or money in lieu thereof, after which they left the island. The Commander and other Officers of this squadron gave so little content to the French Court by their conduct in this expedition, that they were put under arrest upon their arrival in France.

The Marquis of Caermarthen having offered to go with a small squadron of men of war to Madagafcar, to suppress the pyrates there, who were become very troublesome and dangerous to the navigation in those parts, the Commons appointed a Committee to consider that matter; and it was resolved to present an humble address to her Majesty to take into her Royal consideration how the said pyrates might be suppressed; and another, that she would be pleased to use her endeavours to recover and preserve the ancient possessions, trade, and fishery in Newfoundland.

The French Refugees, by private direction of the Bishop of Sam, and some other persons in power, addressed the Queen, representing, "That the Protestant Churches of France, though ever struggling under oppression, held formerly a considerable rank; and that her Majesty's predecessors had always such a tender regard for them, as to protect and support them to the utmost of their power: That the famous edict of Nantes, in favour of the Protestants of France, was, in great measure, owing to the great interest Queen Elizabeth had with King Henry the Fourth of France: That King James the First, her Majesty's Great Grandfather, did often interpose, by his Ambassadors, in behalf of the French Reformed Churches. And, that King Charles the First, her Majesty's Grandfather, intervened as Mediator in the treaty, which Lewis XIII. made with the Rochellers (who held the principal rank among the Protestants of France) and afterwards, upon the French King's infraction of that treaty, began

Changes and promotions.

About this time there were made some changes in several publick offices. The Earl of Stamford, the Lord Herbert of Cherburg, Robert Monkton, and John Pulney, Esquires, were made Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, in the room of the Lord Viscount Weymouth, who had before resigned that post, and of William Blaitwaite, John Pollexfen, and Matthew Prior, Esquires, who were laid aside, as too strongly attached to the Tory-party. At the same time, by the interst of Mr. Secretary Horley, Sir Simon Harcourt was constituted Attorney-General, in the room of Sir Edward Northey; Sir James Montague succeeded Sir Simon Harcourt in the place of Solicitor-General; and the Honourable Spencer Compton, who had exerted his zeal and abilities in the treaty of Union, was made Treasurer and Receiver-General to Prince George of Denmark, and Pay-master to her Majesty's Pensioners, in the room of Mr. Nicholas. In the beginning of May, the Queen declared the Lord Cowper Lord High-Chancellor of Great-Britain. In like manner, the Lord Godolphin was appointed Lord High-Treasurer of Great-Britain. Prince George of Denmark took the oath in the Court of Chancery, as Lord High-Admiral of Great-Britain, and by a new Commission appointed Sir David Mitchell, George Churchill, Mr. Robert Walpole, and Sir Stafford Fairborne, to be Council in the affairs of the Admiralty. In January, the Earl of Manchester received his instructions to go Ambassador Extraordinary to the Republick of Venice, and, in his journey thither, he went to the Courts of Vienna and Turin. But the most considerable change had been made in December, by the promotion of the Earl of Sunderland to the Post of Secretary of State, in the room of Sir Charles Hedges:

Though

"a war with France upon that account." Moreover, they set forth, "That they found and accounted themselves to happy in living under her Majesty's gentle Government, and among a Nation, where they had been so kindly entertained, when driven from their native country by the violence of persecution, that, if they had nothing but their own private interest in view, they would sit quiet and easy, and be contented to share the felicity of her Majesty's natural-born subjects; but that the just concern they ought to have for their brethren, relations, and friends, who still groaned in France under the pressure of persecution, obliged them to lay hold on this occasion, most humbly to beseech her sacred Majesty, that, when her thoughts should be employed in settling the great concerns of Europe in a treaty of peace, her Majesty would graciously vouchsafe to take into her Royal care the interest of the poor distressed Churches of France, which having been ruined by the superstitious vanity of the enemy, so it would add to the solid glory of her Majesty's Reign, to be instrumental in restoring the same." This address having been presented to the Queen, on the 7th of April, by some of the most eminent persons among the French Refugees, she was pleased to tell them, "That she always had a great compassion for the unhappy circumstances of the persecuted Protestants of France: That she would communicate her thoughts upon this matter to her Allies; and she hoped such measures might be taken, as might effectually answer the intent of their petition."

On the 15th of May, Andrew de Matneff, Ambassador Extraordinary from the Czar of Muscovy, had a private audience of the Queen, in which his Excellency delivered to her Majesty a long letter from the Czar, dated April 27, containing a detail of the services he had done King Augustus from his first election to the Crown of Poland; and "complaints of the ill treatment of the Russian troops sent to his assistance; of the imprisoning of Count Patkul, his Minister and General; of King Augustus's non-performance of the treaty made with the Czar; and of his concluding a dishonourable peace with the King of Sweden, without his Czarish Majesty's privy; pursuant to which he had delivered up Count Patkul, on pretence of his being a Swedish Deserter, contrary to the laws of Nations, and even custom of the Barbarians." Desiring, in the conclusion, "That her Britannic Majesty would use her good offices, to procure the liberty of the said Patkul, or, at least, that he might be used as his Czarish Majesty's Minister, and not as a subject of the King of Sweden; as also to obtain the enlargement of the other

"Russian General Officers, and other subjects of Muscovy, detained at Stockholm. As for the remaining "of the Russian auxiliaries, now upon the Rhine, the Czar put them under her Britannic Majesty's protection, and desired, that they might enter into her Majesty's service, or that of her Allies; or, at least, "he intreated her Majesty's good offices, that they might have leave to return home with safety." In compliance with the Czar's desire, the Queen used her good offices in favour of Count Patkul, but her intercession proved ineffectual, and that unfortunate Gentleman was afterwards barbarously put to death.

The Republick of Venice, having at last appointed the Chevaliers Erizzo and Pisani their Ambassadors Extraordinary, to compliment the Queen on her accession to the Throne, their Excellencies made their public entry into London, on the 19th of May, in a very magnificent manner; and having, for three days, been splendidly entertained at Somerjet-House, had their public audience of the Queen, on the 22d, at St. James's House. Three days after they had a private audience of her Majesty, and then returned homewards, Signior Cornaro, the Venetian Ambassador in ordinary, continuing here to take care of the concerns of that republick.

The Government thinking fit to check the licentiousness of the press, William Pittis, being convicted of writing a scandalous and seditious libel, intituled, The case of the Church of England's Memorial fairly stated: Or, A modest inquiry into the grounds of those prejudices, that have been entertained against it, was fined by the Court of Queen's Bench one hundred marks, and to stand in the pillory at Charing Cross with a paper on his head, denoting his offence; and also near the Royal Exchange in Cornhill in like manner. Which sentence was executed accordingly. George Sawbridge, convicted of publishing that libel, was fined two hundred pounds, and committed to the Queen's Bench prison till he paid the same; and also to be brought by the Marshal of that prison to all the Courts at Westminster (the Courts sitting) with a paper on his head, denoting his offence.

On the 30th of April the case of Dr. James Drake, indicted for writing a pamphlet, called Mercurius politicus, was argued at the Queen's Bench bar; but it appearing, that, in the libel set forth in the information, the word nor was inserted, and in the libel given in evidence the word nor; upon arguing of that error, the Court inclined for the party accused; whereupon the trial was adjourned, and he was afterwards acquitted. The same day Dr. Joseph Browne was tried at Guild-Hall before the Lord-Chief-Justice Holt for handing to the press a paper of verses, called The Country Parson's advice to the Lord Keeper; where, in a gross, ironical 1707. Though it was not till after much sollicitation, that the Queen could be prevailed with to make this alteration (1).

The Convocation would have opposed the Union, but prevented.

The Convocation, as usually, sat this winter with the Parliament. Though they had, in their former Session, differed much about the form of an address to the Queen, yet now they agreed pretty unanimously, and both Houses presented a congratulatory address upon the wonderful success of her arms, and acknowledged the Church to be in a safe and flourishing condition under her Majesty's Administration. But, notwithstanding this address, when the debates concerning the Union were before the Parliament, some in the Lower-House spoke very tragically on that subject, and a Committee was named to consider of the present danger of the Church. 1707.

This was carried, by the private management of some aspiring men amongst them, who hoped, by a piece of skill, to shew what they could do, that it might recommend them to farther preferment; they were much cried out on, as betrayers of their party, for carrying that address, so, to recover their credit, and because their hopes from the Court were not so promising, they resolved now to act another part. It was given out, that they intended to make an application to the House of Commons, against the Union; to prevent that, the Queen wrote to the Archbishop, ordering him to prorogue them for three weeks: By this means that design was defeated, for, before the end of the three weeks, the ironical way, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Dukes of Southampton, Richmond, Somerset, Bolton, and Devonshire, the Earls of Montague, Pembroke, Essex, and Orford, the Lords Sommers, Mohun, Haverham, Wharfen, and Hallifax, and the Bishop of Sarum, were scurrilously reflected upon. The charge being plainly proved by the Printer, and by Mr. Lewis, Secretary to Mr. Harley, the Jury brought the Doctor in guilty; and some time after he received sentence to stand in the pillory, which was executed upon him.

On the 6th of May, being the last day of the term, Judge Powl, in the Court of Queen's-Bench, pronounced sentence against Mr. William Stephens, Rector of Sutton in Surry, for writing a seditious pamphlet, called, A letter to the Author of the Memorial of the Church of England; which contained most scandalous reflections on the Duke of Marlborough's conduct last campaign, and against Mr. Secretary Harley. The Judge told the prisoner, "That his offence was the greater, in that it was the duty of his calling to teach others the positive precept of the gospel about the reverence we owe to Sovereigns, and those, who are in authority under them; but, that his crime was still the more heinous in abusing the Duke of Marlborough, a Peer, who had done such glorious actions for his Country, and so well deserved of the common cause." Adding with respect to the Secretary, "That the traducing the Queen's Ministers was a down-right abuse upon her Majesty herself." Stephens would have spoken something by way of submission, but the Judge pronounced the judgment of the Court against him; which was "That he should be fined an hundred marks, and stand twice in the pillory with a paper fixed to his hat, denoting his offence; the first time at Charing-Cross, and the next day before the Royal-Exchange; and that he should find sureties for his good behaviour for a twelvemonth." However, it being represented and considered, that the inflicting such an ignominious punishment on a person in holy orders might give offence to the whole Clergy; the execution of this sentence was first suspended, and at last the pillory remitted, though with this mortifying circumstance, that Stephens was brought to a publick house at Charing-Cross, from whence he saw the scaffold, and multitudes of people gathering together to be spectators of his disgrace.

On the 6th of November, Dr. Joseph Browne being convicted of writing and publishing another scandalous and seditious libel, intitled, A letter to the Right Honourable Mr. Secretary Harley, occasioned by his late commitment to Newgate: Together with his interpretation of that paper, called, "The Country-Parson's advice to my Lord-Keeper," laid to his charge; reflecting upon the Great-Officers of State, and several of the Nobility of this Kingdom, was, on the 14th of November, fined for the same by the Court of Queen's-Bench forty marks, and ordered to stand in the pillory two days after at Charing-Cross and also near the Royal-Exchange in Cornhill, and to give security for his good behaviour for one year.

Edward Ward, being convicted of writing, printing, and publishing several scandalous and seditious libels, particularly, Judithas Radivorus, Or, A Burlesque Poem on the times, highly reflecting upon the Queen and the Government, was likewise, on the 14th of November, fined forty marks, and ordered to stand twice in the pillory, with a paper on his head, denoting his offence, and to give security for his good behaviour for one year. Some were of opinion, that these, and other prosecutions of the like nature, were chiefly promoted by Mr. Secretary Harley, not only that he might thereby appear to be entirely devoted to the General and Treasurer, but with a deeper design of rendering them obnoxious by those unpopular severities.

(1) The Dutcheffs of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 172, observes, That the Whigs. after the services they had done, and the assurances the Queen had given them, thought it reasonable to expect, that one of the Secretaries at least should be such a man, as they could place a confidence in. They believed they might trust the Earl of Sunderland; and, though they did not think him the properest man for the post, yet, being the Duke of Marlborough's son-in-law, they chose to recommend him to her Majesty, because, as they expressed themselves to the Dutcheffs, they imagined it was driving the nail that would go. The Duke indeed was not in his inclination for this promotion of the Earl; but, how hard pressed both he and the Lord-Treasurer Godolphin were by the Whigs to have it brought to effect, appears from the following letter of his to the Dutcheffs, dated at Grametz in October 1706. "When I writ my last, I was very full of the spleen, and, I think, with too much reason: My whole time, to the best of my understanding, has been employed for the public good, as I do assure you I do in the presence of God, neglecting no opportunity of letting 83 [the Queen] see what I take to be her true interest. It is terrible to go through so much uneasiness. I do not say this to flatter any party, for I will never do it, let the consequence be what it will. For, as parties, they are both in the wrong. But it is certain 73* and his adherents are not to be trusted. So that 83 [the Queen] has no choice but that of employing those, who will carry on the war, and support 91 [Lord Godolphin]. And, if any other method is taken, I know we shall go into confusion. Now, this being the case, I leave you to judge, whether I am dealt kindly with? I do not say this for any other end but to have your justice and kindness, for in that will consist my future happiness. I am sure I would venture a thousand lives, if I had them, to procure ease and happiness to the Queen. And yet no number of men could persuade me to act as a Mi-

1707. the Union had passed both Houses. But, when one factious design failed, they found out another; they ordered a representation to be made to the Bishops, which set forth, that, ever since the submission of the Clergy in Henry the Eighth's time, which was for a course of a hundred and seventy-three years, no such prorogation had ever been ordered, during the sitting of Parliament: And they besought the Bishops, that, from the conscientious regard, which they doubted not they had, for the welfare of this Church, they would use their utmost endeavours, that they might still enjoy those usages, of which they were possessed, and which they had never misemployed: With this, they brought up a schedule, containing, as they said, all the dates of the prorogations, both of Parliament and Convocation, thereby to make good their assertion: And, to cover this seeming complaint of the Queen's proceedings, they passed a vote, that they did not intend to enter into any debate, concerning the validity of the late prorogation, to which they had humbly submitted. It was found to be a strange and a bold assertion, that this prorogation was without a precedent: Their charge, in the preserving their usages, on the consciences of the Bishops, insinuated that this was a breach made on them: the Bishops saw this was plainly an attempt on the Queen's Supremacy; so they ordered it to be laid before her Majesty: and they ordered also a search to be made into the records. For though it was an undoubted maxim, that nothing but a positive law could limit the Prerogative, which a non-usage could not do; yet they ordered the schedule, offered by the Lower-House, to be compared with the records: They found that seven or eight prorogations had been ordered, during the sitting of Parliament, and there were about thirty or forty more, by which it appeared,

"nister in what was not my opinion. So that I shall never fail in speaking my mind very freely, and as my opinion is, that the takers, and all the adherents of 73, are not for carrying on the war, which is for the true interest of the Queen and Kingdom; you may depend I shall never join with any but such, as I think will serve her and the true interest of our Country with all their hearts. And, if the war continues but one year longer with success, I hope it will not be in any body's power to make the Queen's business uneasy. And then I should be glad to live as quiet as possible, and not envy the governing men, who would then, I believe, think better of 90 [Duke of Marlborough] and 91 [Lord Godolphin] than they now do. And I will own frankly to you, that the jealousy some of your friends have, that 90 [Duke of Marlborough] and 91 [Lord Godolphin] do not act sincerely, makes me so weary, that, were it not for my gratitude for 85 [the Queen], and concern for 91 [Lord Godolphin], I would now retire, and never serve more. For I have had the good luck to deserve better from all Englishmen, than to be suspected for not being in the true interest of my Country, which I am in, and ever will be, without being of a faction. And this principle shall govern me for the little remainder of my life. I must not think of being popular; but I shall have the satisfaction of my going to the grave with the opinion of having acted, as became an honest man. And, if I have your esteem and love, I should think myself intirely happy. Having writ thus far, I have received your two letters of the 20th and 21st, which confirm me in my opinion before. And, since the resolution is taken to vex and ruin 91 [Lord Godolphin], because 83 [the Queen] has not complied with what was desired for 117 [Lord Sunderland], I shall from henceforth despise all mankind, and think there is no such thing as virtue. For I know with what zeal 91 [Lord Godolphin] has pressed 83 [the Queen] in that matter. I do pity him, and shall always love him as long as I live, and never be a friend to any, that can be his enemy.

"I have writ my mind very freely to 83 [the Queen] on this occasion; so that, whatever misfortune may happen, I shall have a quiet mind, having done what I thought my duty. And, as for the resolution of making me uneasy, I believe they will not have much pleasure in that, for, as I have not set my heart on having justice done, as I shall not be disappointed, nor will I be ill used by any man."

The Dutchess of Marlborough likewise wrote the following letter to the Queen on this occasion:

"By the letter I had from your Majesty this morning, and the great weight you put upon the difference bewixt the word Nation and Nation in my letter, I am only made sensible (as by many other things) that you were in a great disposition to complain of me, since to this moment I cannot for my life see any essential difference betwixt these two words as to the sense of my letter, the true meaning of which was only to let your Majesty know with that faithfulness and concern, which I have ever had for your service, that it was not possible for you to carry on your Government much longer with so much partiality to one sort or one men, though they lose no opportunity of diserving you, and of shewing the greatest inveteracy against my Lord Marlborough and my Lord-Treasurer, and so much discouragement to others, who, even after great disobligations, have taken several opportunities to shew their firmness to your Majesty's interest, and their zeal to support you, and your Ministers too, only because they had been faithful and useful servants to you and the public.

"This was all the sense and meaning of my letter; and, if you can find fault with this, I am so unhappy, as that you must always find fault with me; for I am incapable of thinking otherwise as long as I live, or of acting now but upon the same principle, that I served you before you came to the Crown for so many years, when your unlimited favour and kindness to me could never tempt me to make use of it in one single instance, that was not for your interest and service. I am afraid I have been too long in explaining my thoughts upon the subject of my own letter, which it seems has been to great an offence; and how justly I leave you to judge; and I must beg your patience, since I am not very like to trouble you again, to let me say something upon the subject of your letter to my Lord-Treasurer, which he has shewn me to-day, with more concern than I know how to express.

"This was indeed the subject of my own letter, and the occasion of it; for I do not only see the uneasiness and the grief he has to leave your service, when you seem so desirous he should continue in it; but I see, as well as he, the impossibility of his being able to support it, or himself, or my Lord Marlborough, for it all hangs upon one thread; and, when they are forced to "leave

1707. ed, that the Convocation sat sometimes before, and sometimes after a Session of Parliament, and sat sometimes, even when the Parliament was dissolved: Upon all this, the Queen wrote another more severe letter to the Archbishop (who had now prorogued the Convocation to the 10th of April) in which she signified her resentment of the Lower-House: Intimating, that she looked upon them as guilty of an invasion of her Royal Supremacy repaid in her, by the Law and the Constitution of the Church of England; and declaring, that, if any thing of the like nature was attempted for the future, it would make it necessary for her to use such means for the punishing offences of this nature, as are warranted by law. The Lower-House continued sitting after the prorogation. But, on April 10, when the Archbishop sent for the Lower-House, to communicate her Majesty's letter, and some Members appeared without the Prolocutor, he asked for him, and was told he was gone into the country. This appeared to be a contempt or neglect of such a nature, that it was not to be suffered; whereupon he proceeded to pass a sentence of Contumacy against him for his absence, reserving the punishment of his crime to the 30th of the same month, to which day the Convocation was prorogued, by a schedule, backed with a Royal writ. The Archbishop deferred the punishment, on purpose, that the Prolocu-tor might have opportunity by his submission, 1707. on that day that was fixed on, to have prevented it. But, in this interval, a Protestation against the Archbishop was prepared, by the dissatisfied Members of the Lower-House, which was offered to the House on April 30, with an intimation, that it was the opinion of an eminent Counsellor who had been advised with, that no Process, begun before a prorogation upon the Royal writ, could be continued after such prorogation; and a concern seemed to be discovered, that the Royal Supremacy should be this way broken in upon: And to they who by the Archbishop, and the Queen herself, were charged with invading the Royal Supremacy, were willing it should be believed, that none had a greater concern for the Supremacy than they, and therefore by a protestation, which was carried up April 30, by the Prolocutor, the majority of the Lower-House declared the sentence of Contumacy, and the process continued after the prorogation, to be an invasion of the Royal Supremacy, unlawful, and altogether null: And yet, though the Prolocutor carried up this at the command of the House, and was pressed by his party to stand it out, yet, upon sounder advice given him by some, who understood the law better, he made a full submission, with which the Archbishop was satisfied, and the sentence was taken off. However, a party continued with "leave your service, you will then indeed find "yourself in the hands of a violent party, who,

"I am sure, will have very little mercy or even hu"manity for you. Whereas you ought to prevent "all these misfortunes by giving my Lord-Treasur"er and my Lord Marlborough (whom you may "so safely trust) leave to propose those things to
"you, which they know and can judge to be ab"solutely necessary for your service, which will put it "in their power to influence those, who have "given you proofs, both of their being able to "serve you, and of their desiring to make you
"great and happy. But, rather than your Majesty "will employ a party man, as you are pleased to "call Lord Sunderland, you will put all things in "confusion; and, at the same time, that you say
"this, you employ Sir Charles Hedges, who is in "one against you, only that he has voted in re"markable things, that he might keep his place;
"and he did the same thing in the late King's "time, till at last, that every body saw he was "just dying, and he could lose nothing by differing "with that Court. But formerly he voted with "these men, the enemies to this Government,
"called Whigs; and if he had not been a party-
"man, how could he have been Secretary of State,
"when all your Councils were influenced by my Lord
"Rochester, Lord Nottingham, Sir Edward Seymour,
"and about six or seven more just such men, that "call themselves the Heroes for the Church? But "what Church can any man be of, that would "disturb to just a Government as yours? Or how "can any body be in the true interest of England,
"that opposes you and your Ministers, by whose "advice, in four years time, you are very near "pulling down the power of France, and making "that Religion, they only talk of, not only more "secure than in any of the late Reigns, but putting it "upon a better foundation than it has been since the "Reformation?

"You are pleased to say, you think it a great "hardship to persuade a man to part with a place

"he is in possession of, for one, that is not va"cant. In some cases that were certainly right,
"but not in this; for Sir Charles Hedges can "have the place he desires immediately; and it is "much better for him, unless he could be Secretary "of State for life. He will have two places, that "are considerable, one of which he can compass
"no other way; and this is so far from being a "hardship, that he and all the world must think "it a great kindness done him; and he must be a very "weak man, if he lost the opportunity of having "such a certainty, when he cannot flatter himself,
"that (whatever happens) he can be supported long in
"a place of that consequence, for which he is so unfit.
"He has no capacity, no quality, no interest, nor "ever could have been in that post, but that every "body knows, my Lord Rochester cares for nothing so "much as a man, that he thinks will depend upon "him. I beg your Majesty's pardon for not wait"ing upon you; and I persuade myself, that, long "as my letter is, it will be less troublesome to your "Majesty."

It was a wonder to many, as the Dutches observes, that this affair of the Earl of Sunderland's promotion met with such difficulties, considering his relation to the Duke, whose merit, with his Queen and Country, was every year augmenting. But it quickly appeared, that the difficulties, raised by her Majesty against parting with Sir Charles Hedges, were wholly owing to the artifice and management of Mr. Harley the other Secretary of State, whose interest and secret transactions with the Queen were then doubtless in their beginning. Harley had been put into that post by the Lords Marlborough and Godolphin, when my Lord Nottingham, in disgust, resigned it. They thought him a very proper person to manage the House of Commons, upon which so much always depends. And his artifices had won upon them so far, that they could not be persuaded, but they might safely trust him, till experience too late convinced them of the contrary. But it

1707 with great impudence to assert, that their schedule was true, and that the Queen was misinformed, though the Lord-Chancellor and the Lord Chief-Justice Holt had, upon perusal of the records, affirmed to the Queen, that their assertion was false, and that there were many precedents for such prorogations.

is no wonder, that, with such views, as he then had, he should be unwilling to see a Secretary of State displaced, over whom he thought he had some influence, and through whose hands the greater part of the business of his own office (scandalously neglected by himself) used to pass; and much more unwilling to have him succeeded by a person, over whom he had no power whatsoever. As for Sir Charles Hedges, when he found, how backward the Queen was to dismiss him, he was so prudent, as to make a greater advantage to himself, by quitting his post, than he could have done by holding it.
